and former minister for immigration says the ties which bind the nation together are beginning to 'fray'.

Mr Jenrick said it was a result of the influx of migrants and the sneering attitude of the 'metropolitan establishment' toward English identity.

'The combination of unprecedented migration alongside the dismantling of our national culture, non-integrating multiculturalism and the denigration of our identity has presented huge problems,' he writes.

'It has had a clear impact on our culture, customs and cohesion. Taken together, the attitudes and policies of our metropolitan establishment have weakened English identity. They have put the very idea of England at risk.

'The public have consistently voted against all of this. Those in Westminster are underestimating the depth of
