As Argentina, emboldened by Starmer's surrender of Chagos, vows to reclaim 'Las Malvinas', senior military voices and MPs say...

HANDS OFF OUR FALKLANDS!

ARGENTINA has vowed to make a fresh grab for the Falklands following Labour's surrender of the Chagos Islands.

Buenos Aires 'welcomed' Sir Keir Starmer's humiliating handover of the Indian Ocean archipelago to Mauritius.

And Argentine officials pledged to 'recover full sovereignty of Las Malvinas' – 42 years after the Falklands War.

Yesterday veterans, politicians and members of the Armed Forces urged Sir Keir to slap down Argentina's renewed calls for the South Atlantic islands.

But the Prime Minister refused to guarantee that no other British Overseas Territories would be given away – sparking a panicked clarification from a No 10 spokesman.

Hours after Labour confirmed it would give the Chagos Islands to one of China's main allies, Argentine foreign minister Diana Mondino said: 'The long dispute between Britain and Mauritius has come to a conclusion... we welcome this step in the right direction and the end to outdated practices.'

In an inflammatory intervention, she added:
