today, said he was determined to end the 'legal merry-go-round' that has prevented any migrants being sent to the east African state.

But MPs on the Right of the party continued to warn he would fail unless he strengthened his flagship legislation – with some even saying they could help Labour vote it down if he refused, plunging the Government into crisis.

In a major blow, Tory deputy chairman Lee Anderson said last night he would side with the rebels, despite strenuous efforts by Downing Street to keep him on board. Minutes later, fellow deputy Brendan Clarke-Smith said he would also join today's revolt.
