CLAPHAM CHEMICAL ATTACKER ASYLUM FIASCO

Judge doubted his account, he failed questions on Christianity and was convicted sex offender. But Afghan was STILL allowed to stay as convert

THE Clapham chemical attacker won asylum in spite of his repeated dishonesty, it can be revealed today.

Abdul Ezedi, 35, failed a test on Christianity even though he claimed to be a convert.

The asylum judge who heard the sex offender's appeal to stay in the UK decided he had 'not been honest in several aspects of his account'.

In spite of those concerns, Judge William O'Hanlon allowed Ezedi's appeal on asylum and human rights grounds, saying on balance his religious conversion was genuine. His body was found in the Thames last month, ending a massive police hunt after he attacked a mother and her children with an alkali substance in January.

Court papers released to the Mail raise further questions about Ezedi's claim to have converted to Christianity - with him at one point saying in Home Office documents that the
