VICARS IN UPROAR OVER CHURCH'S £1BILLION SLAVERY REPARATIONS

By Alex Ward
Social Affairs Correspondent

A BILLION-POUND reparations push by the Church of England to atone for its historic links to slavery is 'anti-Christian', critics warned last night.

The church will ask super-wealthy families and investors to help it build an enormous pot of cash to address 'enduring harms from enslavement'.

The CofE announced last year that it was setting up a £100million fund for reparations to recognise that it once profited from the slave trade. But a report yesterday said this was 'insufficient' to 'fully redress' the centuries-long impact of the 'great evil' of slavery – and called for a much bigger target of £1billion.

Critics said the move risked putting parishioners off donating to their cash-strapped churches as it would appear the CofE had 'vast sums to throw around'.

Reverend Ian Paul argued it was 'anti-Christian' and suggested it was motivated by 'a death wish for the Church of England'. Last
