"All the News That's Fit to Print"

The New York Times

THE WEATHER

Today, intervals of clouds and sunshine, breezy in the afternoon, high 58. Tonight, skies becoming clear, low 45. Tomorrow, mostly sunny,

VOL. CLXXIII ... No. 60,131

© 2024 The New York Times Company

SUNDAY, APRIL 21, 2024

Prices in Canada may be higher

$6.00

Rebel soldiers in the Karenni Nationalities Defense Force riding in the back of a pickup truck near the Myanmar front line.

Ragtag Resistance Sees the Tide Turning

By HANNAH BEECH

The night Ma Suu Kyi thought she would die of her wounds on the front lines of a forgotten war, a crescent moon hung overhead. A pendant of the Virgin Mary dangled around her neck. Maybe those augurs saved her. Or maybe, she said, it was not yet time for her to die.

"When I joined the revolution, I knew my chances of surviving were 50-50," Ms. Suu Kyi, 21, said of her decision to enlist as a rebel soldier, fighting to overthrow the junta that returned Myanmar to military dictatorship three years ago. "I'm an ordinary girl, an ordinary young person. I believe in federal democracy and human

Ms. Suu Kyi said the words "federal democracy" in English. There are no easy words for the concept in Burmese.

Victories Give Myanmar's Rebel Fighters Hope

Since the junta in Myanmar staged its coup in February 2021, ending a brief period of democratic reform and training its guns once again on peaceful protesters, much of the country has turned against the military. A new generation, which came of age during the civilian administration of the Nobel laureate Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, has taken to arms, joining rebels who have opposed military dicta-

The world's gaze has remained focused on other conflicts on other continents — to the consternation of many in Myanmar who wonder why the chaos and death here brings little global outcry. Now, after three years of desperate resistance, the battle lines are changing fast. The rebels have overrun scores of military bases and taken over dozens of towns. The tempo of victory has quickened in recent days, and anti-junta forces now claim to control more than half of Myanmar's territory, from lowland jungles to the foothills of the Himalavas.

Much of the fighting's rhythm seems syncopated to that of another century: trenches dug into unrelenting mud, the Continued on Page 13

Swimmers Tested Positive, Then Won Olympic Gold

Concerns of Doping Cover-Up for Chinese Team Allowed to Compete in Tokyo

By MICHAEL S. SCHMIDT and TARIQ PANJA

Twenty-three top Chinese swimmers tested positive for the same powerful banned substance seven months before the Tokyo Olympic Games in 2021 but were allowed to escape public scrutiny and continue to compete after top Chinese officials secretly cleared them of doping and the global authority charged with policing drugs in sports chose not to inter-

Several of the athletes who tested positive — including nearly half of the swimming team that China sent to the Tokyo Games went on to win medals, including three golds. Many still compete for China and several, including the two-time gold medalist Zhang Yufei, are expected to contend for medals again at this year's Summer Games in Paris.

China acknowledged the positive tests in a report by its antidoping regulator, saying that the swimmers had ingested the banned substance unwittingly and in tiny amounts, and that no action against them was warranted.

But an examination by The New York Times found that the previously unreported episode sharply divided the antidoping world, where China's record has long been a flashpoint. American officials and other experts said the swimmers should have been suspended or publicly identified pending further investigation, and they suggested that the failure to do so rested with Chinese sports officials; swimming's international governing body, World Aquatics; and the World Anti-Doping Agency, the global authority that oversees national drug-testing programs.

Those authorities decided not to act despite an email exchange between a Chinese antidoping official and a top world swimming official appearing to indicate that a violation may have taken place and would, at the least, have to be publicly acknowledged.

Even after other national and international antidoping officials repeatedly provided the global regulator, known as WADA, with intelligence suggesting a coverup and doping by Chinese swimmers, the agency chose not to try to hold the athletes accountable, asserting "a lack of any credible evidence" to challenge China's version of events. WADA defended its decision not to take action, calling the criticism unsubstantiated. The F.B.I. learned in the past year about the positive tests, the Chinese rationale for clearing the athletes of wrongdoing, and the inaction by WADA, according to two people familiar with the matter and a document examined by Federal investigators have taken steps in recent weeks to learn more about what occurred. A spokesman for the F.B.I. declined to comment. Any inquiry by the American authorities would come with a powerful new tool: a law passed in 2020 giving the Justice Department powers to criminally prosecute attempts to corrupt international sports events through

Continued on Page 8

Wang Shun at the 2022 Asian Games. He won gold in Tokyo.

$95 Billion Bill For Three Allies Passes in House

By CATIE EDMONDSON

WASHINGTON — The House voted resoundingly on Saturday to approve $95 billion in foreign aid for Ukraine, Israel and Taiwan, as Speaker Mike Johnson put his job on the line to advance the long-stalled package by marshaling support from mainstream Republicans and Democrats.

In four back-to-back votes, overwhelming bipartisan coalitions of lawmakers approved fresh rounds of funding for the three U.S. allies, as well as another bill meant to sweeten the deal for conservatives that could result in a nationwide ban of TikTok.

The scene on the House floor reflected both the broad support in Congress for continuing to help the Ukrainian military beat back Russia, and the extraordinary political risk taken by Mr. Johnson to defy the anti-interventionist wing of his party who had sought to thwart the measure. Minutes before the vote on assistance for Kyiv, Democrats began to wave small Ukrainian flags on the House floor, as hard-right Republicans jeered.

The legislation includes nearly $61 billion for Kyiv; $26 billion for Continued on Page 26

IIMI D'AUTREMONT FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

Gut Check for Women's Hockey

A new pro league is taking root but can't seem to find an audience in New York. Metropolitan.

One Town's Homelessness Fight Could Reshape a National Crisis

By ABBIE VANSICKLE on Monday with broad ramifica-

GRANTS PASS, Ore. — Inside a warming shelter, Laura Gutowski detailed how her life had changed since she became homeless two and a half years ago in Grants Pass, a former timber hub in the foothills of southern Oregon.

Her husband's death left her without steady income. She lived in a sedan, and then in a tent, in sight of the elementary school where her son was once a student. She constantly scrambled to move her belongings to avoid racking up more fines from the police.

"I never expected it to come to this," Ms. Gutowski, 55, said. She is one of several hundred homeless people in this city of about 40,000 that is at the center of a major case before the Supreme Court tions for the nationwide struggle with homelessness. After Grants Pass stepped up enforcement of local ordinances that banned sleeping and camping in public spaces by ticketing, fining and jailing the homeless, lower courts ruled that it amounted to "cruel and unusual punishment" by penalizing people who had nowhere else to go.

Many states and cities that are increasingly overwhelmed by homelessness are hoping the Supreme Court overturns that decision — or severely limits it. They argue that it has crippled their efforts to address sprawling encampments, rampant public drug

Continued on Page 22

Streaming TV Becomes World of Watch-Cancel-Repeat for Nomadic Subscribers

By JOHN KOBLIN

Early last year, Josh Meisel and his wife wanted to watch a new buzzy Peacock drama, "Poker Face," starring Natasha Lyonne.

But Mr. Meisel, a scientist who lives outside Boston, did not subscribe to Peacock. He paid for half a dozen other streaming services and was reluctant to sign up for another. So he and his wife made a pact. If they weren't watching "Poker Face" after two weeks, they would cancel Peacock.

Sure enough, they lost interest and canceled. And then he realized: Why stop there?

In the weeks that followed, Mr. Meisel, who is 39, cut loose Max, Apple TV+ and Hulu. He eventually resubscribed to Hulu and Apple TV+ when there were shows the couple wanted to watch -Hulu for "The Bear," Apple TV+ for "Slow Horses" — but canceled both again after they finished watching a new season.

And he is hardly alone. Americans are getting increasingly impulsive about hitting the cancellation button on their streaming services. More than 29 million — about a quarter of domestic paying streaming subscribers — have canceled three or more services over the last two years, according to Antenna, a subscription research firm. And the numbers are rising fast.

The data suggests a sharp shift in consumer behavior — far from the cable era, when viewers large-

were stuck with a single Continued on Page 21

NATIONAL 18-26

Little School on the Ski Slopes

The isolated ski town of Alta, Utah, took inspiration from the past by building a one-room schoolhouse for the children of its year-round residents.

SUNDAY STYLES

Inside View From Far Outside

Rusty Foster writes a gossipy newsletter plumbing the New York-centered media world from a rocky island reachable only by ferryboat.

SUNDAY BUSINESS

Confessional of Sports Bettors

Craig Carton, the bombastic WFAN broadcaster, shows a different side on a weekly show that focuses on the stories of gambling addicts like himself. PAGE 4 ARTS & LEISURE

'Catfish' and the Heart Burned

For 12 years, the reality series has traveled the U.S., offering snapshots of what can go wrong when the search for love mixes with technology.

SUNDAY OPINION

Nicholas Kristof

TICKETS AT TELECHARGE.COM

PAGE 6

