

With all eyes on trial, tensions rise inside and out

People drawn to Plymouth to take part in spectacle

By Lea Skene and Shelley Murphy

GLOBE STAFF

PLYMOUTH — An international spotlight on this small-town Massachusetts courthouse, a media circus every day, high-stakes jury deliberations. A group of women, in quiet solidarity.

As the world awaits a verdict in Lindsay Clancy's murder trial, a cloak of hushed apprehension has settled over the courthouse, a nondescript brick building about 2 miles south of Plymouth's waterfront downtown. The picturesque coastal community more often attracts tourists and history buffs, drawn to its expansive beaches and national historic sites.

Instead, in recent days, many have come to bear witness to the prosecution of Clancy, the Duxbury mother charged with first-degree murder in the deaths of her three children. The case has already captivated a massive audience and sparked public outrage over gaps in psychiatric care and women's postpartum mental health.

Clancy alleges she was experiencing postpartum psychosis when she strangled the children with exercise bands in the basement of the family's Duxbury home in January 2023. She then attempted suicide by slashing her neck and wrists before jumping out a second-story window.

On Tuesday morning, when jurors indicated they were deadlocked, observers in the courtroom gallery let out a collective gasp. Then came the sound of frantic typing from reporters covering the trial. After more than a month of testimony and roughly 23 hours of deliberations over four days, the jury couldn't reach a unanimous verdict; the judge told them to keep trying.

TRIAL, Page A10

GREG DERR/THE PATRIOT LEDGER/POOL

Jurors in the Lindsay Clancy case continued deliberating after telling the judge they were stalled, and being urged to keep at it. B1.

The pick of the orchards

Here are the places to go when you want new varieties, cider doughnuts, or that farm feeling. G1.

The Postal Service is poised to launch a hastily built, error-riddled computer system that could jeopardize mail voting, according to a whistleblower statement. A2.

The US military said it struck military targets in Iran in retaliation for Iranian attacks on ships and US forces in the region. A3.

Several apps that use AI to connect users with new friends have popped up in the past few years, including one in Boston. B5.

A former Massachusetts public safety secretary told a federal jury that Suffolk Sheriff Steven W. Tompkins held no sway over permitting a cannabis company at the heart of a case of alleged corruption. B1.

Despite Bill Belichick's rough year at UNC, he has a history of solving problems and figuring things out, writes Ben Volin. C1.

A convincing win for Markey

Moulton's focus on 80-year-old senator's age seems to have little effect

By Samantha J. Gross and Sam Brodey

GLOBE STAFF

Senator Ed Markey, the 80-year-old progressive champion who has for years resisted the political gravity that's felled other members of the Democratic Party's old guard, on Tuesday handily beat back Representative Seth Moulton and his calls to pass the generational torch in their often-bitter Senate primary.

The Associated Press called the race for the Malden Democrat roughly 30 minutes after polls closed, underlining Markey's dominance over his younger challenger. Markey will face Republican nominee John Deaton and third-party socialist candidate Joe Tache in the November general election.

SENATE

Markey spoke to a jam-packed ballroom at the Omni Parker House in Boston, where supporters and Democratic stalwarts, including Boston Mayor

Michelle Wu, packed in to celebrate the incumbent.

Against a backdrop of high school and college-age students, Markey promised the crowd a future chock-full of progressive priorities, from abolishing federal immigration enforcement to passing universal child care to cementing abortion rights in law.

He said the race is "all about the American dream" in Massachusetts and in states where he has backed other successful progressive Democrats this cycle.

"That fight is in our hands here in Massachusetts, in Maine, in Michigan," he said. "Our progressive movement knows how to fight. We cannot surrender tomorrow."

About an hour after polls closed, Moulton took the stage at his own election night watch party at a union hall in Dorchester to tell supporters he called Markey to congratulate him on his victory.

"Challenging the establish-

SENATE, Page A6

DANIELLE PARHIZKARAN/GLOBE STAFF

Senator Ed Markey acknowledged the crowd as he came out with his wife, Susan Blumenthal, at the victory party Tuesday.

GOVERNOR

Healey will take on Minogue in November

By Chris Van Buskirk

GLOBE STAFF

Governor Maura Healey, who has pitched herself as a bulwark against President Trump, will face off in the November election against Republican Mike Minogue, a former medical device company executive who poured millions of dollars of his personal wealth into winning the GOP nomination.

In early returns, Minogue was running far ahead of his Republican primary opponent, Brian Shortleeve, a former MBTA executive under Governor Charlie Baker, who conceded the race about one hour after polls closed.

Healey, meanwhile, was unopposed in the Democratic primary and is now the party's official nominee.

With the results of the GOP now in hand, the general election will likely be as much about Trump as it will be about Healey's first term in office.

At her own primary night party at a union hall in Dorchester, Healey was quick to cast blame on Trump for the high cost of living in Massachusetts, telling supporters the president put in place harmful tariffs, cut funding and access to health care, and slashed funding for science, research, and local universities.

"We see the damage Trump is doing every day. He's raising your costs, he's terrorizing our communities, he's taking away your health care and your rights," Healey said, warning that her Republican opponent "will bring Trump's agenda to Massachusetts."

The primary comes as Massachusetts faces challenges on multiple fronts: a housing crunch that is driving many residents to consider leaving the state, for example, and a higher cost of living that

GOVERNOR, Page A7

HOUSE

Lynch and Neal turn back challenges

By Tal Kopan, Jim Puzanghera, and Brian MacQuarrie

GLOBE STAFF

Two of the state's longest-serving US House members, Stephen Lynch of South Boston and Richard Neal of Springfield, defeated younger progressive challengers on Tuesday.

Along with the resounding victory by Senator Ed Markey, it was a notable hold for three longtime incumbent ►Koh's the winner in 6th District. B1.

Democrats in Massachusetts after a wave of anti-establishment progressive fervor has toppled incumbents elsewhere in the country during this election cycle.

Lynch, 71, fended off Patrick Roath, 39, a lawyer from Jamaica Plain and onetime aide to former governor Deval Patrick, in the Eighth Congressional District, which includes downtown Boston and its southern suburbs. Neal, 77, defeated 39-year-old high school teacher Jeromie Whalen from South Hadley, in the First Congressional District in Western Massachusetts.

Both challengers put up stronger-than-usual campaigns against the septuagenarians, arguing they were too conservative and out of touch for their districts. But ultimately, Lynch's and Neal's arguments in favor of experience, seniority, and their long records in Congress won out.

Three other Massachusetts incumbents — Jake Auchincloss of Newton, Katherine Clark of Revere, and Bill Keating of Bourne — also had Democratic primary challengers but all easily held on to their seats.

Neal walked into his election night

HOUSE, Page A6

DISTRICT ATTORNEYS

Hayden declares victory over Rollins

By Danny McDonald, Spencer Buell, Laura Crimaldi, and Nick Stoico

GLOBE STAFF

The incumbent district attorneys for Middlesex and Suffolk counties declared victory in the Democratic primary Tuesday night, while the race for the open seat in Norfolk County was undecided among seven candidates looking to succeed a retiring incumbent.

In Suffolk County, incumbent Kevin Hayden told supporters just before 10 p.m. that he believed he had clinched another four-year term, fending off challenges from the progressive firebrand Rachael Rollins, and from Linda G. Champion, who had been backed by Boston's largest police union.

"It feels pretty darn good," Hayden said to cheers at his election night party at the Stockyard restaurant in Brighton.

But Rollins had yet to concede late Tuesday and a spokesperson indicated the campaign would not likely issue a statement until Wednesday. The Champion campaign could not be reached for comment.

With no Republican in the field, Tuesday's primary was a winner-takes-all contest for the office representing Boston, Chelsea, Revere, and Winthrop. The Suffolk race had an especially spicy edge to it, as Rollins was Hayden's predecessor in the office before being appointed US attorney for Massachusetts by then-president Joe Biden. However, during the 2022 election, Rollins sought to help Hayden's challenger, then-Boston city councilor Ricardo Arroyo, including trying to leak to the press information to undermine Hayden.

Rollins was forced to resign from the

DISTRICT ATTORNEY, Page A7

Summer down

Wednesday: Overcast, cool. High 69-74. Low 61-66.

Thursday: T-storms. High 74-79. Low 64-69.

High tide: 3:14 a.m., 3:31 p.m.

Sunrise: 6:10 Sunset: 7:17

Weather and Comics, G6-7.

VOL. 310, NO. 64

*

Suggested retail price
$4.00

0 947725 4