

A WOMAN holds a photo of Iranian Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei at a protest Sunday in Tehran.

Altadena raid stirs fears that sweeps will hinder rebuilding

Immigrant labor is especially crucial after fires, hard to replace

By Roger Vincent and Jack Flemming

When ICE agents raided the construction site of a burned property in Altadena this month, they made no arrests. The man they were after was not there. But the mere specter of them returning spooked the workers enough to bring the project to a temporary halt.

The next day, half of the 12-man team stayed home. The crew returned to full strength by the end of the week, but they now work in fear, according to Brock Harris, a real estate agent representing the developer of the property.

“It had a chilling effect,” he said. “They’re instilling fear in the workers trying to rebuild L.A.”

Harris said another developer in the area started camouflaging his construction sites: hiding Porta Potties, removing construction fences and having

A WORKER at an Altadena construction site visited by ICE this month.

Trump targets tuition benefits

For 24 years, undocumented immigrants who graduated from high school in California have received in-state tuition benefits at public colleges and universities under a law that’s given tens of thousands access to higher education that many couldn’t otherwise afford.

When the California Legislature passed Assembly Bill 540 in 2001, it was the second state in the nation — after Texas — to embrace such tuition policies. Bipartisan efforts quickly grew across the country, with more than 20 states adopting similar policies.

But recent court actions by the Trump administration are causing alarm among immigrant students and casting a shadow over the tuition benefit in California, the state with the large Administration is suing Texas, Kentucky over policies that allow undocumented students to pay in-state rates. Is California next?

By Jaweed Kaleem

est population of people living in the U.S. without legal authorization.

On June 4, the U.S. Department of Justice sued Texas over its tuition statute for immigrants without documentation, alleging it violated a federal law that prevents people who do not have legal status from receiving public benefits. Texas did not defend its law and instead put its support behind the Trump administration, leaving 57,000 undocumented college students in the state in educational limbo after a federal judge blocked the statute.

Last week, the Justice Department launched a similar suit in Kentucky, asking a federal judge to strike down a state practice that it says unlawfully

As Hollywood struggles, CEO pay rises

Sky-high executive compensation in 2024 renews scrutiny on an entertainment industry in crisis and widening income gap with workers

By Wendy Lee

Warner Bros. Discovery is in poor shape — so much so that Chief Executive David Zaslav has decided to unwind the 2022 merger he orchestrated by splitting the company in two.

But Zaslav himself is doing just fine, to the chagrin of shareholders.

In a rare searing rebuke, investors recently cast a symbolic vote disapproving of Zaslav’s 2024 compensation package, which rose 4% to $51.9 million compared with the year before.

The package, approved by the company’s board of directors, ensured that Zaslav remained one of the nation’s highest-paid corporate leaders. Proxy advisory firm Institutional Shareholder Services, known as ISS, described the company’s executive compensation packages as “an unmitigated pay-for-performance misalignment.”

The situation renewed scrutiny of the compensation levels for leaders of the top entertainment companies, which remain high compared with peers in other industries.

Although 2024 was a bad year for Hollywood, it was a very good year for some of the industry’s top executives, according to a survey of data by Equilar, which studies executive pay, for The Times.

The median compensation for those executives for 2024 was $33.9 million, up 7% from 2023, Equilar said. That’s about double the median compensation of CEOs at S&P 500 companies, which was $17.1 million last year.

The compensation data include stock options, base salaries, bonuses and other perks for CEOs from Netflix, Fox Corp., Roku, Lions Gate Entertainment Corp., AMC

Suicide bomber kills 22 in Syria

Attacker opens fire and then detonates an explosives vest inside a Greek Orthodox church filled with people. WORLD, A3

Newsom’s plastic bottle problem

Governor’s single-use water bottles on podcasts draw attention to shifting environmental stance. CALIFORNIA, B1

Weight of history in musical drama

The Tony-winning revival of “Parade” lands in gripping form at the Ahmanson Theatre. ENTERTAINMENT, E1

Weather

Sunny.
L.A. Basin: 78/59. B5

7 85944 00200 5

After bombing 3 nuclear sites, U.S. braces for Iran’s retaliation

Pentagon officials say precision strikes on enrichment program caused severe damage and destruction.

By Michael Wilner and Nabih Bulos

WASHINGTON — Fallout from President Trump’s historic gamble to strike Iran’s nuclear facilities reverberated across the Middle East on Sunday, as Washington braced for an unpredictable response from a cornered but determined Islamic Republic.

Although the Iranian government downplayed the impact of the U.S. attacks, noting the depths of its nuclear know-how built over decades of study, U.S. military officials said the precision strikes against Iran’s three main nuclear facilities caused “extremely severe damage and destruction.”

A senior Israeli official told The Times that Jerusalem was so satisfied with the operation that it was prepared to suspend hostilities if Iran ends its missile salvos against Israeli territory.

night Hammer,” was a contingency years in the making, prepared and assiduously avoided by his predecessors over two decades as a desperate last resort to a nuclear Iran.

Ever since Tehran resumed its fissile enrichment program in 2005, Republican and Democratic presidents alike have warned that the Islamic Republic could never be allowed to obtain a nuclear weapon. But a constellation of diplomatic talks

Anguish, hope in L.A. after airstrikes

The Iranian American community wrestles with ‘very mixed and complicated’ feelings.

By Daniel Miller

Roozbeh Farahanipour sat in the blue-green glow of his Westwood restaurant’s 220-gallon saltwater aquarium and worried about Iran, his voice accented in anguish.

It was Sunday morning, and the homeland he fled a quarter of a century ago had been bombed by the U.S. military, escalating a conflict that began nine days earlier when Israel sprang a surprise attack on its perennial Middle Eastern foe.

“Anger and hate for the Iranian regime — I have it, but I try to manage it,” said Farahanipour, owner of Delphi Greek restaurant and two other nearby eateries. “I don’t think that anything good will come out of this. If, for any reason, the regime is going to be changed, either we’re facing another Iraq or Afghanistan, or we’re going to see the Balkans situation. Iran is going to be split in pieces.”

Farahanipour, 53, who’d been a political activist be-

THE BROAD museum is among downtown’s attractions. Above, Susan Killian waits for a bus in May.

Downtown is up with residents despite woes

By Roger Vincent

Like many downtown Los Angeles residents, Ricardo Sebastián doesn’t own a car and prefers it that way.

“I do not want the responsibility of owning a vehicle. That’s not for me,” said Sebastián, who grew up in Chicago relying on public transit.

The 38-year-old consultant travels around L.A. by train and bus, but finds most of what they need close to home in the South Park district near Crypto.com

Arena, including leisurely strolls.

“I enjoy going for long walks from one end of downtown to the other,” Sebastián said in Muffin Can Stop Us, a casual coffee bar and restaurant at the base of a high-rise apartment complex on Hope Street. “I love living downtown.”

Sebastián is hardly alone in that sentiment. In addition to being a commercial center with office skyscrapers, trendy hotels and cultural venues, downtown L.A. remains a vibrant and growing residential neighborhood