

U.S. claims limited strike met its goals

Satellite imagery shows damage to nuclear sites, though extent is unclear

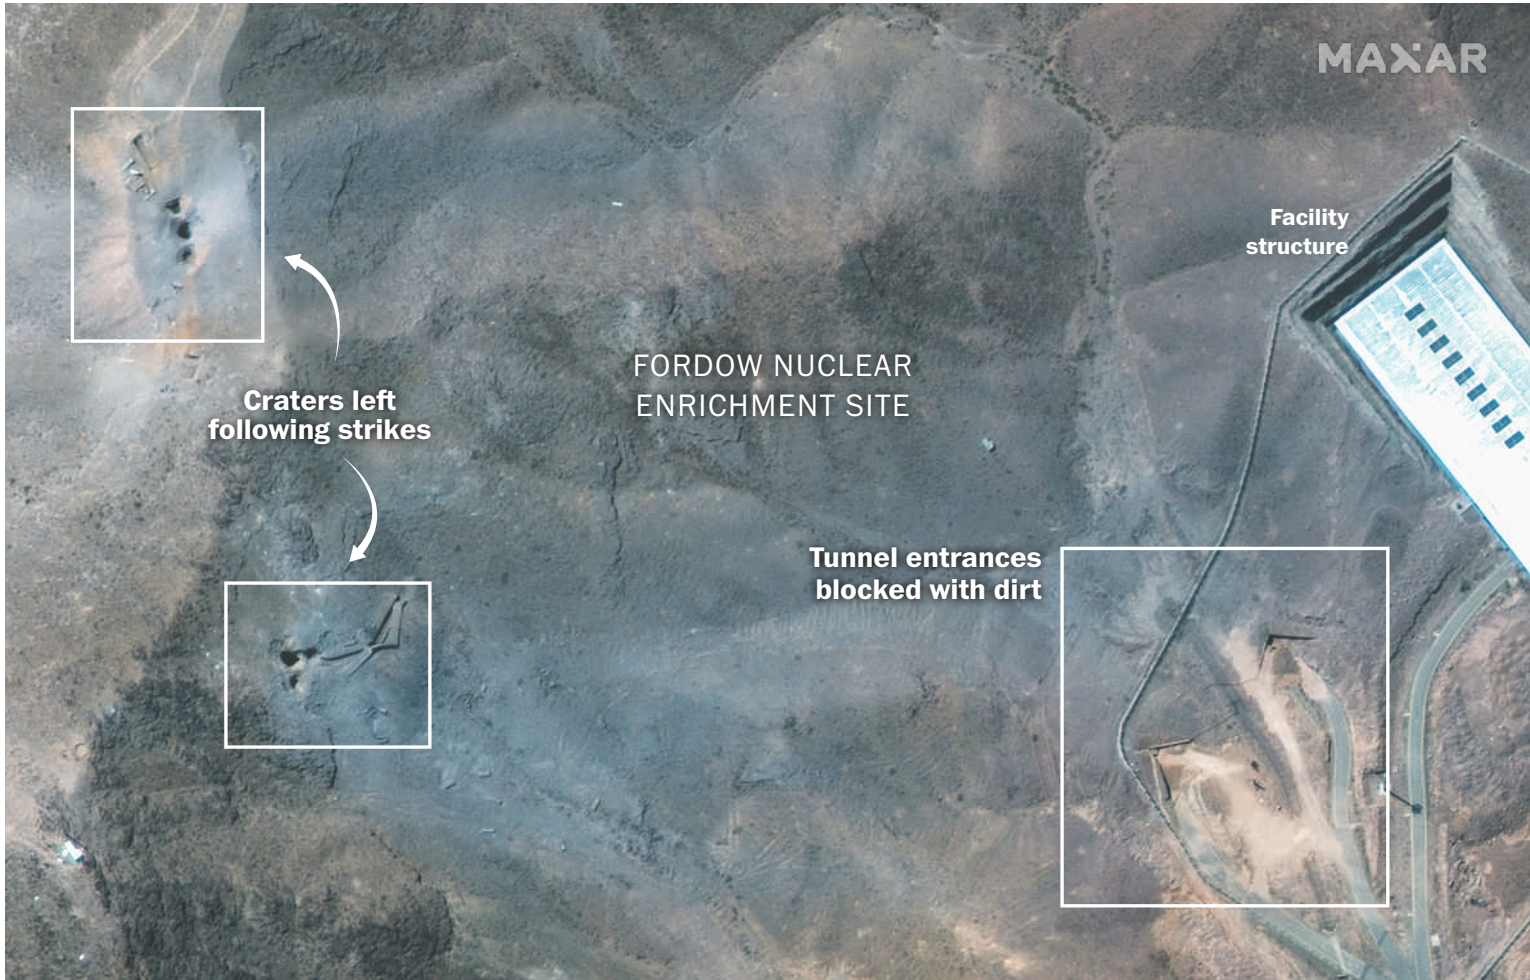

This story is by Meg Kelly, Joyce Sohyun Lee, Nilo Tabrizy, Evan Hill and Dylan Moriarty

Satellite imagery taken Sunday morning shows at least six apparent bomb entry points at Iran's key Fordow uranium enrichment facility, according to a Washington Post visual analysis and multiple experts. The images are the first look at damage to one of Iran's main nuclear facilities after American bombers struck that site and two others early Sunday local time.

President Donald Trump said the strikes "completely and totally obliterated" Iran's three key nuclear facilities at Fordow, Isfahan and Natanz. Pentagon leaders used a more measured description at a news conference Sunday morning, saying the sites all sustained "extremely severe damage" and that they believed they had achieved a "destruction of capabilities" at Fordow.

A senior Israeli official told The Post that an early assessment

SEE DAMAGE ON A9

A satellite photo taken Sunday shows signs of damage from U.S. airstrikes at Iran's mainly underground Fordow nuclear site.

U.S., OTHER NATIONS PUSH FOR TALKS

Trump references regime change on social media

BY KAREN DEYOUNG AND DAN LAMOTHE

The massive U.S. attack launched overnight on Iran's nuclear program was unprecedented in its scope and the weaponry used, but was intended as a limited strike and not to overthrow the Iranian government, top Trump administration officials said Sunday.

As Defense Secretary Pete Hegseth and Gen. Dan Caine, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, provided details in an early-morning news conference of the U.S. stealth attacks on Iran's three main nuclear sites, senior Trump administration officials took to the Sunday news broadcasts with a unified message: The goals of the operation had been achieved and nothing more was planned unless Iran chose to retaliate — and the door to negotiations, on U.S. terms, was open.

"Our view has been very clear that we don't want a regime

SEE IRAN ON A8

Weighing retaliation, regime in Tehran faces an existential choice

BY SUSANNAH GEORGE AND YEGANEH TORBATI

DUBAI — After a U.S. attack on Iran's nuclear facilities, Iran is weighing its response — with its top diplomat saying "all options" are on the table after officials in Washington proved "they only understand the language of threat and force."

The United States "opted for a dangerous military operation and aggression against the people of Iran," Iranian Foreign Minister Abbas Araghchi said Sunday, and he separately warned of "everlasting consequences."

For Iranian officials, the choice of how to retaliate is existential. A wider war would not only risk increased violence against the Iranian state, but senior Iranian officials believe an expanded conflict could also threaten regime survival, according to analysts and officials briefed on the matter.

The Trump administration has warned Iran against retaliation. "There will be either peace or there will be tragedy for Iran, far greater than we have witnessed over the last eight days," said President Donald Trump.

Defense Secretary Pete Hegseth said at a Pentagon news conference Sunday that "this mission was not and has not been about regime change." He said messages have been delivered to Iranian officials that "now is the time to come forward for peace."

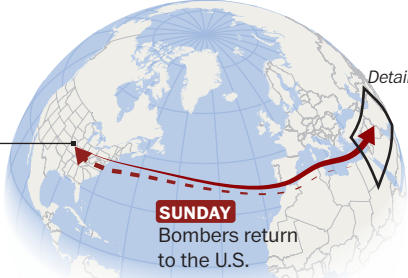

But after more than a week of war, it's unclear how easily Iranian officials are able to

SEE RESPONSE ON A7

Timeline of Operation Midnight Hammer

EARLY SATURDAY

Seven B-2 Spirit bombers depart Whiteman Air Force Base in Missouri. They are accompanied by dozens of tankers and refuel midair multiple times on the 18-hour flight. Some B-2s flew west to the Pacific as a decoy.

All times Eastern. Locations are approximate. Sources: Pentagon, Council on Foreign Relations, IAEA, OpenStreetMap

Trump's 'two weeks' statement hid growing plan to attack, officials say

BY NATALIE ALLISON AND MICHAEL BIRNBAUM

For days, President Donald Trump played coy about whether he would strike Iran, declaring that he hadn't yet made up his mind even as he approved attack plans and directed military officials to ready their forces.

Within a small circle of White House and administration officials, however, it was clear that even when Trump said Thursday that he might take as long as "two weeks" to decide, an attack on Iran's nuclear facilities was imminent, and the ruse was already underway.

Just over 36 hours after that announcement, a host of military aircraft — including seven B-2 bombers — were on their way to Iran.

The number of administration officials read in on the plan remained small. Across the White House, some staff were in the dark about if and when the strikes would occur until shortly before — in some cases after — Trump announced the mission to the world on Saturday evening.

Air Force Gen. Dan Caine, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, described the highly classified mission as one with "very few people in Washington knowing the timing or nature."

Trump's statement about potentially waiting up to two weeks "was our attempt to throw the Iranians off guard," a senior administration official with direct knowledge of the operation said.

"But there was also some truth to it," said the official, speaking

SEE TICK TOCK ON A10

Gulf anxiety: Arab nations worry about the prospects of a regional war. A6

As bees collapse, a key to their secrets might vanish

Trump's proposed budget would defund the top federal lab on the wild pollinating insects

BY RUBY MELLEN AND SALWAN GEORGES

Sam Droege, sporting worn hiking boots and blue jeans, walked through a lush field of tall grass and poison ivy — a typical commute to the government lab he has run for more than 23 years.

The wildlife biologist paused between the two cream-colored sheds that house one of the country's largest bee collections. His floral shirt billowed in the breeze as he pointed out different plants. "Bastard toadflax," Droege chuckled. "Great name." The meadow was awash with sunlight and birdsong. Butterflies and bees flitted from bud to bud, digging their furry faces into dusty pollen.

"I planned to never retire," Droege said. "But now all of that is changing."

Droege, a slender 66-year-old who wears his long white hair in two neat French braids, is one of the world's leading native bee

SEE BEES ON A16

SALWAN GEORGES/THE WASHINGTON POST

Sam Droege, one of the world's leading experts on native bees, holds a specimen at his lab in May.

Routine traffic stops become major tool in ICE crackdown

BY SILVIA FOSTER-FRAU

Chelsea White and her husband were driving home from cleaning office buildings one May evening when they happened upon a Tennessee Highway Patrol checkpoint. It was a situation the couple feared — and had taken precautions to avoid.

White rolled down the driver's-side window on the Ford Fusion with their company's logo. She drove because her husband, Hilario Martinez Garcia, 46, is undocumented and cannot obtain a license in Tennessee.

One of the officers looked at Martinez, she recalled, and instructed them to pull into a nearby parking lot and step out of the car. Agents in black vests began patting them down and reaching into their pockets. They let White, 31, go when they saw her driver's license. But her husband had no proof of U.S. citizenship.

The officers escorted him away.

"That was the last time I saw him," she said.

As the Trump administration aims to ramp up the number of unauthorized immigrants arrested across the United States each day, Immigration and Customs Enforcement is dramatically expanding its partnerships with police agencies, effectively deputizing local police officers as immigration agents. Some departments have made hundreds of arrests, many of them during routine traffic stops.

The consequences for those

SEE MIGRANTS ON A4

NOTE TO READERS

We have made some changes to the format of the print edition, including moving Health & Science to Mondays and reordering the daily sections. For more on these changes, see our editor's note on A2

IN THE NEWS

Thunder reigns in the NBA Oklahoma City survived a Game 7 matchup with underdog Indiana to secure its first championship since the franchise moved from Seattle in 2008. C1

The 'bro show' must go on Broadway is targeting male theatergoers with productions such as "Glengarry Glen Ross." B1

THE NATION Scientists are trying to use the lure of "Jaws" to advance shark conservation efforts. A2
The decision to strike Iran has unsettled some allies of the "America First" movement. A11

THE WORLD Iran's parliament endorsed the closure of a crucial choke point for the world's oil supply. A9
Israeli forces recovered the bodies of three hostages from Gaza, authorities said. A12

THE ECONOMY The GOP's tax-and-spending package would undo billions of dollars in electric-vehicle investments by the Postal Service. A13

THE REGION A Maryland woman is using her front yard for eye-catching homemade political statements. C7

Virginia Democrats' primary to fill the term of Rep. Gerry Connolly is a mad-dash race that will test voters' appetite for breaking from the establishment. C7
In Virginia, the excavation of a 1760s school has offered glimpses into the lives of enslaved and free Black children. C7

STYLE This week, Sean "Diddy" Combs's defense is expected to call forth its own witnesses. B1
HEALTH & SCIENCE Sharing a home with a soon-to-be ex-spouse can make for a turbulent, emotionally costly time. Here's how to cope with the situation. D1

BUSINESS NEWS.....A13
COMICS.....B4
OBITUARIES.....C10
OPINION PAGES.....A14
TELEVISION.....B6
WORLD NEWS.....A6

CONTENT © 2025
The Washington Post
Year 148, No. 54256

