

Tariffs to hit shoppers' wallets

Walmart and other retailers say they are raising prices because of Trump's trade war.

By MALIA MENDEZ, CAROLINE PETROW-COHEN AND SEAN GREENE

Walmart, the nation's largest retailer known for affordability, announced it would be raising prices, providing the clearest signal to date of the effects of President Trump's steep tariffs on U.S. shoppers.

In an earnings call Thursday, executives for the retail giant told industry analysts that an increase in prices would be unavoidable in the face of the highest import duties the U.S. has seen since the 1930s.

Goods including vegetables and furniture will see a jump in price, executives said, a trend that will worsen in July when back-to-school shopping begins. Car seats made in China could increase in price by $100, the company said.

"We're wired to keep prices low, but there's a limit to what we can bear, or any retailer for that matter," Walmart Chief Financial Officer John David Rainey told the Associated Press.

Like other businesses, the company didn't give an outlook for its earnings, reflecting uncertainty in the economy.

Walmart is just the latest retailer and major U.S. company to announce price increases related to the tariffs and trade war with China. Others include consumer products giant Procter & Gamble and Ford, which

Menendez brothers' path is now easier

Newsom dismisses clemency probes, clearing the way for parole hearings.

By RICHARD WINTON AND JAMES QUEALLY

Erik and Lyle Menendez may be another step closer to freedom after Gov. Gavin Newsom withdrew his request on Thursday for clemency investigations into their case, turning a hearing scheduled in June before the parole board into an opportunity for them to be granted early release.

The move streamlines the potential path to freedom for the brothers, who have served more than 35 years in prison since being sentenced for killing their parents with shotguns in 1989 and who successfully argued before a judge earlier this week to be resentenced to 50 years to life from life without parole.

"We are hopeful that the governor will write the final chapter in the brothers' release," their attorney, Mark Geragos, said.

Newsom's decision is the latest in a series of moves

Questions loom over order to house homeless veterans

Amid growing space and cost concerns, Trump has called for about 6,000 to be sheltered at the VA's West L.A. campus

By DOUG SMITH

President Trump's executive order calling on the Department of Veterans Affairs to house thousands of homeless veterans on its West Los Angeles campus by the end of his term promises the relief veterans have been seeking in federal court for more than a decade.

But the May 9 order gave no insight into how the president planned to overcome hurdles that have long stymied the dream of a vibrant veteran community on the 388-acre property, which was donated to the U.S. government in 1888 as a home for disabled soldiers.

Trump's order called for establishing a National Center for Warrior Independence — with the capacity to house about 6,000 — "in which homeless veterans in the Los Angeles metropoli-

Riverside's big move is a small, self-driving bus

Its electric shuttles represent a bid to be the next Motor City

By ANTHONY SOLORZANO

GINA FERAZZI Los Angeles Times

THE OHMIO shuttle debuts in Riverside, the first city in the U.S. to offer such a fully self-driving bus.

the Riverside Municipal Airport this week, followed by one in downtown Riverside and another at UC Riverside by the end of the program's first year.

To date, other iterations of self-driving buses around the country are limited to private roads or properties, or rely on drivers to lend the occasional hand or foot for certain parts of the route. But not Riverside's, where officials say the whole route is mapped out and the person behind the wheel is there for just-in-case scenarios, helping passengers and communicating back with RTA headquarters, according to Assistant City Manager Rafael Guzman.

Although the experience isn't supposed to change much for passengers, it can still feel like a sign of big changes to come.

"Now, the robots are trying to replace us," quipped bus rider Patrick Gray, 32, while he waited recently at a Riverside stop for a traditional bus to work. "I'm used to humans driving things, operating things, with this new age of AI and robotic stuff, it's just, you know, it's

Justices sound wary in citizen hearing

None spoke in favor of Trump's plan to deny citizenship at birth. But that wasn't the immediate issue.

By DAVID G. SAVAGE

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court gave a skeptical hearing Thursday to a lawyer for President Trump who was appealing rulings that blocked his plan to deny citizenship to new-borns whose parents were in this country illegally or temporarily.

None of the justices spoke in favor of Trump's plan to restrict birthright citizenship, and several were openly skeptical.

"Every court is ruling against you," Justice Elena Kagan said. "There's not going to be a lot of disagreement on this."

If his plan were to take effect, "thousands of children will be born and rendered stateless," Justice Sonia Sotomayor said.

But Thursday's hearing was devoted to a procedural question raised by the administration: Can a single federal judge issue a nationwide order to block the president's plan?

Shortly after Trump issued his executive order to limit birthright citizenship, federal judges in Maryland, Massachusetts and Washington state declared it unconstitutional and blocked its enforcement nationwide.

In response, Trump's lawyers asked the court to rein in the "epidemic" of nationwide orders handed down by district judges.

It's an issue that has divided the court and bedeviled both Democratic and Republican administrations.

Trump's lawyers argued that on procedural grounds, the judges overstepped their authority. But it is also procedurally unusual for a president to try to revise the Constitution through an executive
