N.E. voters now even more down on president

In poll, pessimism on economy, immigration

By Matt Stout

Voters across three New England states said the country is barreling in the wrong direction, their outlook largely spurred by a deteriorating economy and a suite of Trump administration policies that most consider problematic, a new Suffolk University/Boston Globe poll found.

The survey of 1,000 voters from Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island painted a bleak, if largely unsurprising, portrait from a region that mostly rejected Donald Trump at the ballot box in November.

Still, nearly five months into the president's second term, pessimism about the state of the country — and the economy many voters hoped Trump would repair — appears to have only deepened, the poll shows.

Two-thirds of those surveyed said they do not like the job Trump is doing, with most voters across the three states — 55 percent — saying they strongly disapprove of his performance.

Even in New Hampshire, where Trump has been more competitive across three elections, his ratings were far underwater: Just 35 percent said they approve of what he's done, compared to 64 percent who said they disapprove. Overall, 68 percent said the country is on the “wrong track,” a portion that held steady when looking at results in the three individual states.

The majority of those polled said they also have dim views of national Democratic leaders.

And just one in four voters said the economy is in good or excellent shape. That's a notable drop from the fall. Roughly 41 percent of voters in Massachusetts held that view in October, when Joe Biden was still in office and

Trump tests boundaries by calling in Marines

Blurs line by using federal troops in US; protests spread across country

By Billy Witz, John Yoon, David E. Sanger, and Michael Levenson
NEW YORK TIMES

About 700 Marines arrived in the Los Angeles area Tuesday in response to several days of protests over President Trump's immigration enforcement actions, testing the boundaries of the president's power to use military forces on US soil.

The Marines joined about 4,000 National Guard troops that Trump had also deployed over the objections of Mayor Karen Bass of Los Angeles and Governor Gavin Newsom of California, two Democrats who have said that local and state law enforcement were capable of handling the protests and that the use of federal troops would only inflame tensions.

Meanwhile, as Bass announced an 8 p.m. curfew for a section of the downtown, demonstrations were spreading Tuesday, with thousands of people gathering in at least two dozen cities. Thousands massed in Chicago, chanting anti-ICE and anti-Trump slogans while marching through the city. In New York, blocks of protesters walked together through the streets after assembling in lower Manhattan near a large government building that houses federal immigration offices and the city's main immigration court.

State and city officials, legal experts, and Democrats in Congress have called the deployment of active-duty Marines in Los Angeles deeply alarming.

Deep-blue Calif. revels in making Trump see red

WASHINGTON — After Donald Trump won the 2016 presidential election despite losing the popular vote by about 2.9 million votes, he quickly zeroed in on the major reason: California.

He was trounced in the state by more than 4.2 million votes and claimed, without evidence, that many of those ballots were fraudulently cast.

The relationship between Trump and the nation's most populous state has never really recovered.

And now, as the events of this past weekend showed, it might have hit rock bottom.

While Trump has had his battles with Massachusetts and other Democratic-run states in his two terms in office, California stands out as his biggest, bluest enemy. But the fight, during which Trump has threatened to cut off federal funding to the state, could have ramifications that stretch beyond its borders. If it were its own country, California would have the world's fourth largest economy, meaning its well-being has major consequences for a nation trying to stay out of a recession.

With its progressive policies, a highly diverse population, and total Democratic control, California is the polar opposite of Trump's Make America Great Again vision. He lost the state by millions of

CITY COUNCILOR WINTHROP FARWELL, speaking about homelessness in Brockton

SOME ARE LEFT OUT AS CITIES COME BACK

With former industrial hubs recovering and prices rising, homelessness spikes

BROCKTON — In this former manufacturing hub 20 miles south of Boston, a growing number of men with shopping carts full of belongings sleep in tunnels beneath the commuter rail. People gather in the park across from a downtown shelter. Tents are tucked into grassy patches behind old factories and in roadway medians.

To some extent, homeless people have always existed in places like Brockton. But what's happening now is different.

After a decade of decline, the number of people living on the streets and in shelters has risen sharply across Massachusetts over the past several years. Nowhere has that surge been more pronounced than in the mid-sized cities that ring Greater Boston, former industrial hubs that have long been affordable, if economically challenged, refuges for the working class. Now housing prices have surged, and by some measures, these cities are counting record-high rates of homelessness.

“We’ve reached a critical mass in Brockton,” said City Councilor Winthrop Farwell. “Our city is at the center of what is really a societal crisis, and there is no good answer for how we’re supposed to go about handling it.”

There are many causes of homelessness. But local leaders point to one in particular to explain the recent surge: the soaring cost of housing.

When tech support is the real problem

Scammers posing as helpers prey on the vulnerable — and don't stop until their accounts are dry

Teresa Rogg stood by the kitchen counter in her Quincy home last summer with a phone pressed to her ear, wrapping stacks of $100 bills in tin foil. She then sealed the money in a box, walked out to her yard, and waited for a courier, just as the woman on the phone had instructed.

The man who appeared from the side street remained silent, save for a single word — a passcode. “Blessings,” he said.

“That's how I knew to hand over the box,” she recalled. This kind of pickup, where a stranger would arrive to retrieve her money then immediately disappear, happened four times over the course of two months, Rogg said.

Over those two months, with each pickup, Rogg was unwittingly contributing to her own financial undoing, swept into a growing wave of increasingly elaborate and profes-
