

The Boston Globe

Serving our community since 1872

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 19, 2025

Israel attacks, ending cease-fire

Says captives must be freed; no Hamas response so far

By Patrick Kingsley, Rawan Sheikh Ahmad, Yan Zhuang, Aaron Boxerman, and Michael Levenson
NEW YORK TIMES

JERUSALEM — Israeli forces launched deadly aerial attacks across the Gaza Strip on Tuesday, ending a temporary cease-fire with Hamas that began in January, and raising the prospect of a return to all-out war.

More than 400 people, including children, were killed in the strikes, Gaza's Health Ministry said. Those numbers did not distinguish between civilians and combatants — but the relentless Israeli bombardment produced one of the war's deadliest single-day tolls.

The attacks came after weeks of fruitless negotiations aimed at extending the fragile cease-fire, which paused 15 months of devastating fighting in the territory. The truce's first phase expired in early March, but it had largely held as diplomats worked to broker an extension to free the surviving Israeli hostages and end the war.

The office of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu
GAZA, Page A4

Mass General Brigham will invest $400 million to create a new cancer institute before ending its partnership with Dana-Farber in 2028. B5.

On the 35th anniversary of the Gardner heist, a retired FBI agent spoke about the search and shared his theory. B1.

The National Archives posted thousands of pages of JFK documents related to the assassination, complying with an order by President Trump. A5.

A recipe to celebrate

In our last installment of Winter Soup Club, we offer Italian Wedding Soup, featuring meatballs, greens, and tiny pasta. G1.

Springing up

Wednesday: Still cool. High 48-53. Low 36-41.

Thursday: Cloudy, breezy. High 47-52. Low 40-45.

High tide: 3:03 a.m., 3:35 p.m. Sunrise: 6:49 Sunset: 6:55

Weather and Comics, G6-7. Obituaries, C9.

VOL. 307, NO. 78

*

Suggested retail price $4.00

Another test of Trump's power

Roberts steps in to rebuke critics of federal judge for pushing impeachment

Putin's response

The Russian president agreed to a limited cease-fire with Ukraine but in a call with President Trump, he refused a broader halt. A2.

A blow to Musk

A federal judge said efforts to close USAID likely violated the Constitution "in multiple ways." A5.

By Alan Feuer, Zolan Kanno-Youngs, and Adam Liptak

NEW YORK TIMES

The Trump administration and Republicans in Congress have been waging a multifront attack on the federal judge who is deciding whether the president may use a wartime statute to deport people suspected of belonging to a Venezuelan street gang.

Lawyers for the Justice Department began the week by trying to kick the judge, James E. Boasberg, off the deportation case and then filed court papers declaring he had no authority to stop flights of immigrants from leaving the country under the law, known as the Alien Enemies Act.

On Tuesday, Representative Brandon Gill, Republican of Texas, filed articles of impeachment against the judge, accusing him of having abused his power. That same day, President Trump endorsed the idea of impeachment, calling Boasberg, a centrist Democrat who lived with Justice Brett M. Kavanaugh while they were at Yale Law School, a "Radical Left Lunatic."

All of this — and more — prompted a rare public rebuke by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. who issued a statement Tuesday afternoon essentially telling Boasberg's critics to knock it off.

"For more than two centuries," the chief justice said, "it has been established that impeachment is not an appropriate response to disagreement concerning a judicial decision."

"The normal appellate review process exists for that purpose," he added.

From the moment Boasberg, 62, issued his ruling pausing Trump's summary deportation flights Saturday, the case has emerged as a flashpoint in a larger debate over presidential power, the use of wartime authorities to skirt

TRUMP, Page A7

'There's no rule-following going on right now. To see it all disintegrate is really devastating.'

LEAH JACOBS VARO, International Institute of New England, an organization supporting refugees and immigrants

Crackdown doesn't spare 17-year-old

At top, members of Jose Adalberto Herrera's family looked out the window. Above, his mother showed a picture of the 17-year-old. At right, his 18-month-old sister, Kasandra.

Threat of boy's deportation tears immigrant family apart

By Giulia McDonnell Nieto del Rio
GLOBE STAFF

LEWISTON, Maine — Lisseth Herrera fought back tears as the immigration agent on the other line told her what was about to happen to her teenage son, who had been stopped and detained on his way to work. The officer gave her what sounded like an ultimatum.

"Your son is probably going to be deported to El Salvador," the officer from US Customs and Border Protection told Herrera, in Spanish, according to a recording of the phone call from Feb. 27. "If you wish, you can turn yourself in, and be deported with him. But he is going to be deported either way."

► Reports of ICE arrests rattle Chelsea. B1.

Herrera's son, Jose Adalberto Herrera, who is 17, had been riding to his new job at a construction site earlier that day with his uncle, his mother said. The Maine State Police said in a Facebook post it pulled the car over for speeding and called on Border Patrol for assistance. After determining Jose was in the country without legal status, Border Patrol arrested and detained both the boy and his uncle,

TEEN, Page A6

Cuts threaten Springfield's asthma fight

By Esmey Jimenez
GLOBE STAFF

It was a damning nickname: Springfield, the 2018 asthma capital of the United States.

And the challenge was daunting. How exactly could leaders fix a problem caused by a chronic condition that cannot be cured?

But over the past seven years, the city has made a concerted effort to help manage people's asthma, using a mix of state and federal funding to, among other initiatives, develop a widespread air monitoring system and remodel older homes prone to excess indoor pollutants. Though struggles remain, it hasn't been the asthma capital since.

Now it's at risk of losing at least $19 million in federal dollars it was set to receive this year to double down on some of those efforts, as the Trump administration targets climate-related federal grant funding and anything related to so-called environmental justice communities.

The funding, city officials said, was slated to be used for programs that would improve indoor air quality, which is vital for helping asthmatic residents. But a whiplash of decisions this year has left the money in an on-again, off-again limbo.

Tina Quagliato Sullivan, a deputy
ASTHMA, Page A7

SPACEX VIA ASSOCIATED PRESS

HOME AT LAST

After more than nine months aboard the International Space Station, American astronauts Suni Williams (shown) and Butch Wilmore returned to Earth in a SpaceX capsule Tuesday. The pair had expected to be in space for just a week or so when they launched in June but issues with capsules kept them away. Williams is a Needham native and has an elementary school there named after her. A2.

Legislators may back transparency, but in survey on public records law . . . crickets

By Matt Stout and Anjali Huynh
GLOBE STAFF

Massachusetts state legislators say they are creating a new era of openness on Beacon Hill. They want to make more votes public, better explain the bills they're proposing, and make changes that promote, as one Democrat put it, "extreme transparency."

Very few, however, say they are inclined to embrace another basic requirement: that the Legislature, like the vast majority of public bodies in Massachusetts and its legislative counterparts nationwide, provide records when the public asks for them.

Just 12 percent of state legislators said they believe they should be subjected to Massachusetts' public records law, according to a Globe survey of the state's 198 lawmakers. Currently, government emails, memos, and documents are automatically presumed to be public — unless those records come from the Legislature, the governor's office, or judiciary. All three claim they are completely exempt from the law, either because the law itself says so or the courts have said they're not included among the entities that have to follow it.

Even fewer lawmakers (11 percent) said
TRANSPARENCY, Page A10