Johnson promises to resist subpoena

ICE wants to know who applied for IDs in CityKey program

By Alice Yin

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement subpoenaed the Chicago city clerk's office in April for the personal information of applicants to a municipal ID program popular with immigrants, an apparent new tactic in Republican President Donald Trump's plan to target Chicago as he seeks to ramp up deportations.

The clerk's office received the summons April 17 requiring the city to turn over the past three years of CityKey records, according to a copy obtained by the Tribune in a Freedom of Information Act request. The program was launched in 2017 by former Mayor Rahm Emanuel and city Clerk Anna Valencia as part of a stand against Trump.

Asked whether the city complied with the subpoena, Mayor Brandon Johnson's Law Department first said on Friday it was "responsive," before the mayor's office clarified later in the afternoon that the city has not provided any CityKey documents to ICE, which demanded several years worth of data.

"The city has not turned over any documents related to the CityKey program to federal immigration enforcement. Mayor Johnson believes in upholding the Welcoming City Ordinance," the mayor's spokesperson, Cassio Mendoza, said. "Turning over personal information would betray the privacy and trust of residents who participated in the program. Mayor Johnson will continue to resist any attempts by the federal government to violate the rights and protections of Chicagoans."

While Emanuel and Valencia trumpeted the safety of the CityKey application during its inception, promising the city wouldn't keep identifying documents in case federal officials sought to track down

FATAL CHATHAM SHOOTING

COP REMEMBERED AS 'HARD WORKER'

Police officer struck in the back, autopsy finds, after tactical team conducted investigatory stop

CPD claims more investigation necessary to confirm who shot 4-year department veteran

Earlier in what would be her final shift, Chicago police Officer Krystal Rivera took two guns off the street, authorities said, only to come face-to-face with a rifle later that night.

Rivera, 36, a four-year veteran with a young daughter who lived in the Irving Park neighborhood on the Northwest Side, was killed after the Gresham (6th) District tactical team she was part of tried to conduct an investigatory stop on a person believed to have a weapon about 9:50 p.m. Thursday in the 8200 block of South Drexel Avenue.

The first Chicago police officer to be killed in the line of duty this year, Rivera was mourned by city officials and her fellow officers, who praised her work ethic and asked Chicagoans to keep her family in their prayers.

"Our officer was young, vibrant and a hard worker," police Superintendent Larry Snelling said, speaking from the University of Chicago Medical Center early Friday. "She was a working police officer trying to keep the streets safe."

Flanked by department brass, Mayor Brandon Johnson and other city and state officials, Snelling gave some details about the shooting, but did not offer a full picture of exactly how the shooting unfolded. In response to a reporter's question about the gunfire, Snelling said investigators were waiting on a warrant to search the apartment where the shooting happened.

"Here's the deal: We won't know that until the search warrant is served and we are able to go through that apartment and collect more evidence. The evidence that we collect usually ... gives a story of what occurred in there," Snelling said. "So until we have all of that information we can't rely on just one source at this time."

An autopsy found that Rivera was shot in the back.

A CPD spokesperson declined to comment on the autopsy

Threats against drag performers are down as LGBTQ opposition shifts focus to transgender and gender-nonconforming people, report finds

An 'evolving target' for hatred amid Pride Month

The emails were dashed off, with the agitated posts on social media garnering hundreds of likes. Protests were promised. Supporters mobilized.

But by the time the drag storyline event for children at the Beverly branch library rolled around Tuesday, the scene looked more like a dance party for families than a volatile clash.

Bubbles floated through the air while drag storyline supporters draped in pride flags cheered on families as they entered the library. Dozens of supporters danced to ABBA's "Dancing Queen," easily drowning out the handful of people who showed up to protest.

"We are seeing that the right wing are not showing up in the way that they are saying," said Asher McMahon, executive director of Trans Up Front IL and an organizer of the counterprotest. "By the time more people started showing up, people were in the library."

The scene was a far cry from 2022, when drag events in Illinois were among the most targeted in the country, harassment so intense it forced the owner of a suburban bakery to close down her business after it was vandalized ahead of a highly anticipated, family-friendly sold-out drag show.

Now, three years later, GLAAD, the world's largest LGBTQ media advocacy organization, reports that threats against drag performers are down in Illinois. While it's difficult to ascribe it to one cause, the drop may be due to a mix of drag performers working together to ensure the safety of their audiences, and a more prudent approach to which towns and venues are chosen for shows.

Trump, Musk schism rattling Republicans

By Seung Min Kim

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — As the Republican Party braces for aftershocks from President Donald Trump's spectacular clash with Elon Musk, lawmakers and conservative figures are urging détente, fearful of the potential consequences from a prolonged feud.

But Trump had no plans to call Musk on Friday, two Trump administration officials said, as the acrimonious blowup of their partnership left both men — who lobbed online insults and threats at each other Thursday — with a lot at risk.

A White House official who spoke on condition of anonymity because the person wasn't authorized to speak publicly said Friday that the president planned to sell the red Tesla he bought in March. Trump originally purchased the car to demonstrate his support for Musk amid a backlash over his role in the administration.

White House officials said Trump showed little interest in engaging with Musk, even after the billionaire signaled he would be open to de-escalating the fight.

Late Thursday, Musk backed off a threat to "immediately" decommission SpaceX's Dragon spacecraft, which transports
