Minneapolis officials, protesters dispute federal account of self-defense

WASHINGTON POST

A US Immigration and Customs Enforcement officer on Wednesday fatally shot a 37-year-old woman during an operation in Minneapolis, federal authorities said, a killing that drew outrage from local officials already angered by the Trump administration's massive enforcement effort in the city.

President Trump and the Department of Homeland Security said the officer feared for his safety and was acting in self-defense after the woman threatened him with her vehicle. But state and national Democrats repudiated that claim — which Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey called “bullshit” — accusing the administration of recklessness and demanding an end to the immigration operations.

Police tape surrounded a vehicle suspected to have been involved in the fatal shooting on Wednesday.

bers of Congress described the killing as “murder” and called for federal officials to be held accountable. Hundreds of people gathered for a vigil at the scene Wednesday evening.

“This was an agent recklessly using power that resulted in somebody dying, getting killed,” Frey, a Democrat, said at a news conference. “There's little I can say that will make this situation better, but I do have a message for our community and our city and for ICE . . . We do not want you here.”

The killing follows a string of chaotic clashes across the country in which federal immigration officers have employed aggressive tactics in service of Trump's mass deportation agenda. Officers have been involved in at least a dozen shootings in Trump's second term, according to court records and media reports, and they have tackled immigrants, dragged protesters, and used chemical agents on observers.

An ICE officer shot and killed an undocumented immigrant in Chicago in September after officials alleged he also endangered them with his car. Last month, the American Civil Liberties Union of Minnesota filed a lawsuit against Homeland Security on behalf of six

Quietly for now, some Democrats float i-word

But most say time isn't right for impeachment push with midterms ahead

WASHINGTON — The US military action in Venezuela has spurred some congressional Democrats to evoke a step that haunted President Trump's first term and could become a factor in November's midterm elections: impeachment.

So far, it's just a low rumbling from a handful of House Democrats. An impeachment inquiry is unlikely to get off the ground in 2026 with Republicans holding a slim majority and congressional Democratic leaders wary of a quixotic quest during an election year.

But a similar impeachment push also began slowly in 2017 until a series of Trump controversies collided with Democrats winning the House majority a year later. The result was his first impeachment, in late 2019, on allegations he illegally pressured Ukraine's president to dig up dirt on Joe Biden.

“There's no question that Donald Trump has done numerous things in the first year of his presidency that warrant serious investigation. But similar to 2019, it was something where he grossly abused his power with a foreign country that ultimately pushed Congress over the edge,” said Representative Dan Goldman, a New York Democrat

Altered images complicated Brown probe

AI distortions online fueled rumors, conspiracy theories

PROVIDENCE — As they searched for the gunman who killed two students at Brown University and injured nine others, the Providence Police Department regularly released grainy surveillance images of the suspect taken from private security cameras near campus. Soon after each release, similar-looking images that had been edited with artificial intelligence tools flooded social media, shared by thousands of accounts.

Police tip lines were inundated with bad information. The AI-generated and manipulated images bolstered false narratives and forced investigators to dedicate critical hours going through false leads. Law enforcement officials and AI experts say this flood of digital “slop” is no longer a fringe problem, but an active and increasing threat to public trust that can slow investigations.

The AI-generated images appeared to look like a real person. While the photos released by police never fully showed the suspect's face, the manipulated images distorted his facial features. Others filled in details where the originals were too blurry, with skin that looked air-brushed and larger eyes, effectively making him appear to look like a

Coyotes in urban settings make friends (and enemies)

Alex Amend was driving an Uber near Cambridge's Fresh Pond in the wee hours of a November morning when he spotted an animal scurrying out of sight. A dog, he thought at first.

Then he saw another one, standing tall and proud in the middle of a crosswalk. There was no mistaking it: a coyote. A big one, with dark fur and a bushy tail, paying no mind to his idling car a few yards away (or the do-not-walk signal), until an alert sounded on Amend's phone, prompting the animal to saunter away.

“It's not every day you see that,” said 26-year-old Amend, who lives in Somerville and now works in tech sales.

As neighboring towns develop more of their green space, experts say coyotes are being spotted more often in recent years making themselves at home in local parks and playgrounds, and feasting on rats and rabbits.

“They just come in more,” said Christine Correia, director of Cambridge's Animal Commission.

A growing coyote presence has also become a topic of concern in recent years in other municipalities.

The town of Wrentham was in a tizzy in December after two dogs were killed back-to-back in suspected coyote attacks. In Arlington, which borders Cambridge, town officials in 2022 said they were forced to put a coyote down after a resident had reportedly been feeding it, eroding its fear of humans.

In Cambridge, a city better known for its busy squares full of people than for predators on the prowl, coyotes sun themselves in athletic fields or lounge in the middle of paved walkways.

They jaywalk through intersections or prance across driveways during postal workers' early morning delivery routes.

They massacre rodents and leer at off-leash chihuahuas at Fresh Pond.

Turning the food pyramid upside down

Trump administration calls for more meat, dairy, less processed food

By Elizabeth Cooney, Isabella Cueto, and Sarah Todd

STAT

The Trump administration on Wednesday issued a long-promised revamp of national dietary guidelines, urging Americans to eat more protein and less added sugar and, for the first time, discouraging consumption of highly processed foods.

The guidelines, despite widespread expectations, do not change limits on saturated fats but do encourage eating “healthy fat,” which they say includes beef tallow and butter as well as olive oil. They also include a new, inverted food pyramid, emphasizing the consumption of fruits and vegetables along with protein, dairy, and “healthy fats,” to replace the MyPlate chart that had previously provided visual guidance for American diets.

Health secretary Robert F. Kennedy Jr. delayed issuing the Dietary Guidelines for Americans 2025-2030 for months, after rejecting much of the work of a 20-person scientific advisory committee convened under President Biden.

“Today marks a decisive change in federal nutrition policy,” said Kennedy at a press conference Wednesday, adding that the government had previously been “lying to us to protect corporate profit-taking, telling us that these food-like substances” like high-
