'Problem properties' plaguing city

3 crime-riddled Dorchester buildings owned by same family

On a single block across the street from Franklin Park, the list of complaints is lengthy. Arguments over poker or dominoes that escalate to bloodshed. Public drinking and loud partying. Crack cocaine dealing and fentanyl overdoses. Scooter-pedestrian crashes on the sidewalk. Stolen vehicles, sometimes chopped up in a yard.

Ground zero for the mayhem, according to neighbors and police reports, is a group of three brick apartment buildings from 568 to 580 Blue Hill Ave. in Dorchester. They comprise nearly a quarter of the city's official "problem properties" list, a dubious distinction intended to shame property owners into cleaning up their troubled spots.

Interviews with more than a dozen people who live and work there — and more than two years' worth of Boston police incident reports — reveal a block that has just about every quality-of-life issue you can think of, despite being in one of America's safest cities.

"I'm trying to move somewhere, anywhere else," said one 66-year-old woman, an immigrant from the Do-

ICE foes link Collins's loss to Trump's crackdown

BIDDEFORD, Maine — Dozens of "I voted" stickers adorned a memorial on the corner of Hill and Pool streets on Wednesday, marking the place where an immigrant from Colombia was shot dead by an ICE agent in July.

One sticker, placed on a jersey of the Colombian national soccer team, had the words Para ti written on it.

"For you."

It was a small but poignant reminder that high gas prices and an unpopular war weren't the only issues on the minds of Maine voters on Tuesday, when they chose Democrat Troy Jackson over veteran Senator Susan Collins, a moderate Republican, after 30 years in office. Many Maine residents also dedicated their votes to Johan Sebastián Durán Guerrero, who was on his way to work when an ICE officer fatally shot him during a traffic stop.

Collins's defeat came on the heels of an intense immigration crackdown in Maine that

Election turns richest man into the biggest loser

Who was the biggest winner of the midterm elections? There are so many winners — from the dogged to the complete surprises — to choose from.

NEWS ANALYSIS

Who was the biggest loser? Sure, it's easy to say President Trump. But is he?

Yes, Trump is now the lamest of lame ducks. Like Barack Obama, George W. Bush, and Bill Clinton, he will have to deal with sagging approval ratings and an opposing Congress for his last two years in office. Trump's loss, just by the numbers, was the second-worst since the post-Watergate election, something most Americans have never experienced with their president. With it, the movement Trump created, the era of politics that historians will spend years try-

Suffield Academy, a Connecticut boarding school, is trying to contain the fallout from a crisis involving its headmaster.

Lillian Chen's role was a key part of her company's pitch to clients

Lillian Chen and her husband, Henry Chang, promised they could "ensure admission" to schools.

For some wealthy Chinese parents seeking access to elite American boarding schools, one of the best avenues seemed to be hiring Lillian Chen.

Chen and her husband, Henry Chang, promised they could personally lobby admissions directors and headmasters at selective American boarding schools to "ensure admission" for their customers' children.

And for any parent who might doubt their claims of access, they had a tantalizing response: Chen was an insider herself, a member of the board of trustees at Suffield Academy in Connecticut. She could even introduce them to the head of school.

Then she disappeared from the school's website.

As recently as last month, Chen was a Suffield board member in good standing, according to other trustees. Now she is no longer listed as a member of the 30-person board of trustees. In response to questions, Amy Randall, a Suffield spokesperson, said that Chen resigned from the board last month and that "it would not be appropriate for us to speak to her reasons for choosing to step down."

Chen's resignation is coming to light at a time when the Connecticut boarding school is trying to contain the fallout from a crisis. Its celebrated longtime headmaster, Charles Cahn III, was abruptly put on leave last month, with the school citing an IRS investigation as the cause. The news shocked Suffield parents and alumni because Cahn, who is one of the highest-paid boarding school heads in New England, with annual compensation exceeding $1 million in recent years, was regarded as a beloved and transformational

With deep-pockets partner, chef doubles down on downtown

After announcing plans to close three of his signature Boston restaurants, chef Colin Lynch considered leaving the city altogether. Then restaurateur Chris Jamison asked him to meet over dinner.

Jamison's COJE Management Group is known for upscale, often travel-themed Boston eateries. Now the two men are preparing to unveil a duo of ambitious new venues in the heart of the Financial District: Leomatto, a sprawling Italian restaurant inspired by Sicily and the culinary influences of Southern Europe and North Africa; and The NoX, an invitation-only, private members' dining club built around the massive vault of a former bank.

"I don't want to get involved with a project that doesn't scare me at least a little bit," said Lynch, who got his start working with famed chef Barbara Lynch (no relation) and rose from chef de cuisine at No. 9 Park to executive chef of her former restaurant empire. "It's a big project, so I think it's going to challenge me, and I'm excited about that part of it."

Colin Lynch's next act will look quite different from the one he's leaving. After years of building independent restaurants in the South End, where rising rents and other financial pressures hurt the economics of his business, he's joining forces with COJE, a hospitality group with deep pockets that's built some of Boston's most conspicuous dining rooms. The shift underscores a growing tension in Boston's restaurant scene: As the costs of operating
