‘A summer heat wave in March’

Record-high temps across the Southland pose a deadly health threat, experts say.

By HANNAH FRY

The unusual early heat wave set to hit Southern California this week is heightening concerns about public safety and will mark a test of the state's efforts to combat heat-related deaths in a time of rising temperatures. The sweltering temperatures are arriving months earlier than typical and communities have not had time to acclimate, making the early-season heat particularly dangerous, experts say. Climate scientist Daniel Swain described it as "a full-on summer heat wave in March" in a post on X.

California has grappled with a rise of heat-related deaths in recent years as climate change has driven more prolonged and severe episodes of extreme heat. State officials have made it a priority to combat the crisis, launching an action plan in 2022 to educate the public about the health risks of high temperatures, protect

Oil flows once more in Santa Barbara

Despite protests from state officials, firm reactivates pipelines dormant for a decade.

By GRACE TOOHEY

For the first time in more than a decade, offshore oil is again flowing through a controversial network of pipelines that run from California's Central Coast to Kern County. Following an executive order from President Trump last week, Sable Offshore Corp. announced Monday that it resumed oil flow through pipelines that run across Santa Barbara, San Luis Obispo and Kern counties. The infrastructure is part of an offshore oil operation that the Houston-based company has been trying to restart for more than a year.

The resumption of oil transport through the pipelines marks the latest escalation in a long-running battle between California officials and the Trump administration over energy policy and safeguards.

The network had been closed since 2015, when a corroded pipe burst and caused one of the state's worst oil spills. The so-called Santa Ynez unit was under different ownership at the time.

Sable had struggled to secure necessary approvals and permits from California regulators to restart the offshore oil operation. In the process, Sable has been accused of repeatedly ignoring the directives of state and local officials, as well as criminal acts related to California environmental and coastal laws.

Villaraigosa's dreams of a comeback meet reality

Ex-mayor is near bottom in governor's race polls

By Dakota Smith

Former L.A. mayor and current candidate for governor Antonio Villaraigosa wants voters to know that he navigated billion-dollar budgets, cracked down on violent crime and championed the expansion of bus and rail lines.

The onetime state Assembly speaker argues he's the only Democratic candidate with the experience to do the complicated job of running California.

But Villaraigosa left City Hall in 2013 — eons ago in the world of politics. President Obama was still in office, singer Robin Thicke's "Blurred Lines" was atop the charts and Apple Watches weren't yet a thing.

Because of his distance from elected office, combined with a decent but overshadowed fundraising effort, Villaraigosa lacks a high-profile platform to attract attention in today's fractured media universe, an essential ingredient he needs to remind voters about his experience and accomplishments as mayor and a state lawmaker.

Recent polls show Villaraigosa, 73, wallowing at the bottom of the field, though none of the major Democratic candidates have an overwhelming edge.

Villaraigosa also ran for governor in 2018, coming in third in the primary election behind Democratic rival Gavin Newsom, who went on to win and is now serving his second term, and little-known Republican businessman John Cox.

Political strategist Mike Madrid, who worked for Villaraigosa on that campaign, said the former mayor's absence from politics in recent years is a major liability in this race.

"He's a dogged, determined candidate," Madrid said. "But there are pretty stiff headwinds."

MEMBERS of the Islamic Health Organization survey a destroyed health center in southern Lebanon.

BORJ QALAOUIYA, Lebanon — His evening meal done, Ali Jishi, a nurse serving in the health center of this southern Lebanese town, figured it was calm enough to deliver supplies to the civil defense crew down the road.

He was walking back Friday when he watched the Israeli missile lance through the building's four floors, killing his father and 11 of his colleagues.

"Ten minutes earlier, or 10 seconds later, and I would have been there. It would have got me too," Jishi said.

Jishi, 35, trudged through the blown-out husk of the building two days after the attack, stepping between chunks of masonry dangling from snarled metal rods, to gaze at the still-smoldering maw where the missile hit.

The blast had churned everything into a gray-colored mulch, from which the occasional object could be discerned: a pamphlet on reproductive health, somewhat pristine-looking strips

Trump berates allies who won't safeguard strait

His calls to protect tankers against Iran go unanswered during the historic oil crisis.

By ANA CEBALLOS AND GAVIN J. QUINTON

WASHINGTON — President Trump expressed frustration Monday that U.S. allies were not enthusiastic about sending warships to protect merchant vessels passing through the Strait of Hormuz, a sign of Washington's growing isolation as it tries to stabilize one of the world's most critical shipping lanes amid its war against Iran.

Trump declined to name the "numerous countries" he said had agreed to help reopen the oil route, which has come under the threat of retaliation from Iran, but was annoyed that most longtime allies were hesitant about joining his international police force. He said they should be "jumping to help us."

"Some countries that we have helped for many, many years, we've protected them from horrible outside sources and they weren't that enthusiastic — and the level of enthusiasm, it matters to me," Trump said at the White House.

For Trump, securing allies' help is as much a domestic economic need as it is international diplomacy. Since the hostilities against Iran began on Feb. 28, Tehran has retaliated by targeting regional oil facilities and at least 20 vessels operating in and around the Persian Gulf, the Strait of Hormuz and the Gulf of Oman.

The result has been "the largest supply disruption in the history of the global oil market," according to the International Energy Agency, and it has led to international oil prices surging more than 30% to over $100 a barrel as the war entered its third week with no clear end in sight.

The diplomatic friction, meanwhile, reflects the lim-

FCC issues threat over war coverage

Despite Carr warning, TV stations unlikely to lose licenses over negative reporting.

By STEPHEN BATTAGLIO

Federal Communications Commission Chair Brendan Carr is using his bully pulpit to push back against coverage of the U.S. military action in Iran that his boss President Trump doesn't like, marking an extraordinary escalation in his clashes with the media.

On Saturday, Carr posted a message on X suggesting that TV stations could lose their government licenses to use the public airwaves if they "don't operate in the public interest."

Underneath his statement, Carr shared a social media post from Trump, who complained about the New York Times and Wall Street Journal stories on the five refueling tankers that were hit during an Iranian missile strike on the Prince Sultan Air Base in Saudi Arabia.

Carr seized on Trump's missive to issue a warning to TV outlets, which are frequently threatened by the president when he is angry at their coverage.

It's the latest attempt by the FCC chair to apply pressure on media companies that irritate Trump with critical coverage of his administration.

Since becoming FCC chair last year, Carr has repeatedly threatened to use the levers of power he has to punish TV and radio stations when they get in Trump's crosshairs. His behavior has alarmed free speech advocates.

"Broadcasters that are running hoaxes and news distortions — also known as the fake news — have a chance now to correct course before their license
