Nasdaq Sinks as Tech Rout Deepens

Index logs its worst month in over a year as market takes 'a major gut check'

By David Uberti And Hannah Erin Lang

A selloff in artificial-intelligence stocks snowballed throughout the week and culminated Friday with the Nasdaq composite sliding nearly 3%, marking the index's worst month in more than a year and its worst day since June.

Intel was one of the biggest victims with shares crashing 28.5%, the chip maker's worst daily session on record. The plunge vaporized more than $17 billion in combined paper holdings by two of the company's largest shareholders: the U.S. government and Nvidia.

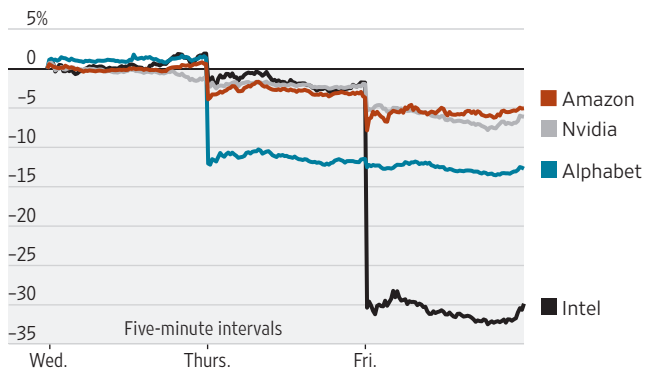

The vulnerabilities in Wall Street's favorite trade have been building for months, periodically appearing around smaller companies drowning in debt. Each time, the largest firms behind the U.S.'s AI buildout have reassured Wall Street by printing profits, suggesting the show will go on even amid higher interest rates.

This week was different. After tech stocks had treaded water for weeks, AI giant Anthropic momentarily rejuvenated investors with a filing that showed soaring revenue ahead of its planned initial public offering. But then publicly traded tech firms re-

Binance Is Racing To Cover Losses After Crypto Heist

Binance executives are racing to cover billions in losses from the biggest crypto heist in history, a breach that blew past everything the exchange set aside to cover such an incident.

The hackers plundered $6.3 billion from the exchange's digital wallets by breaking into a Binance engineer's laptop, among other breaches, Binance said. Stablecoin issuers Tether and Circle, along with other crypto firms, froze about $3 billion of that sum, leaving about $3.3 billion under the hackers' control.

Binance has an emergency reserve called the Secure Asset Fund for Users, or SAFU, set up for cyber incidents like this. As of Thursday, the SAFU held $1.23 billion in bitcoin, blockchain data show.

But the hack, attributed by cybersecurity researchers to North Korea's TraderTraitor hacking group, has rattled the overall crypto market, knocking bitcoin's price. This means the emergency fund is $100 million lower.

Binance said it would fund the difference from its other company reserves. "Binance will cover all losses from the SAFU fund and company funds," co-Chief Executive Richard Teng said Friday on X.

The hack is a black eye for Binance and the broader crypto industry. It led to a widespread discussion about whether Binance could cover the losses and how to make the industry safer—including an online confrontation between Binance founder Changpeng Zhao and SpaceX CEO Elon Musk.

Controversy Surrounds Hands-Off Driving Kit

By Ryan Felton And Christopher Otts

With the press of a button, Matt Peak can do something the makers of his Chrysler Pacifica minivan never intended: take his hands off the steering wheel while he is driving.

The retired aircraft mechanic then sits back and observes while the car cruises at 55 miles an hour past subdivisions and a golf course near his home in Brighton, Mich.

"Scary as heck, the first time you do it," Peak said, resting his hands on his knees during the drive with a Wall Street Journal reporter. But now it's part of his everyday routine.

Peak's hands-free experience, enabled by an aftermarket device from a company called Comma.ai, cost him $1,000 and required about an hour to set up. The company said the device works on more than 350 vehicle models dating back to 2014.

But some drivers have fallen asleep or slammed into stopped vehicles while using the device, according to police and incident reports viewed by the Journal. At least five crashes, including three deaths and 14 injuries, have been linked to Comma.ai, according to the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration. NHTSA opened an investigation into the device in September.

The device is testing the frontiers of technology that

Republican Anxiety Mounts On Eve of Midterm Elections

WASHINGTON—Republicans saw another blaring warning sign, and they called in JD Vance.

A poll released earlier in October showed GOP candidate Anthony Constantino down by 4 percentage points in a rural New York district that President Trump had carried by 21 points just two years ago. The seat, long seen as a GOP stronghold, looked suddenly underwater.

Republican operative Roger Stone raised the alarm with the White House, according to people familiar with the matter, and suggested that a visit by the vice president could solidify the MAGA base and perhaps save the seat of retiring Rep. Elise Stefanik, a Republican. The vice president subsequently scheduled a trip there for the final day before the election.

The late visit to a deep-red district underscores how Republicans are scrambling to play defense amid disquieting signals of possible widespread losses.

Political strategists and pollsters of both parties said Democrats are strong favorites to win back the Republican-led House, as Trump's approval rating drops amid deepening voter frustration over the cost of living and the war in Iran. The GOP-controlled Senate remains a tossup, with Democrats making inroads into

Halloween Is Getting Scarier, Spreading Tension in Suburbia

Parents are pushing back against displays of decapitated bodies and severed pig heads

By Natasha Dangoor

In Verona, N.J., a 12-foot, laser-eyed animatronic skeleton groans and shifts its gargantuan frame over a graveyard of skulls. It is the towering centerpiece of Anthony Carrara's front yard.

Suburban creep

Carrara and his wife are Halloween devotees who frequent haunted houses and horror-themed bars. This year, they ramped up their home display, deploying a grim reaper, a zombie, animal skeletons and Oogie Boogie from "The Nightmare Before Christmas."

It was all too much for one neighbor. Within two days of putting up his decorations in late September, Carrara, 40, received an anonymous note from a local parent complaining that the ghoulish display was terrorizing their children as they walked to school.

"They beg to walk on the other side of the street and close their eyes until we're past," the letter read. "I don't love the safety implications of them focusing harder on avoiding decorations rather than watching out for cars."

How Iran Caused Billions in Damage To U.S. Bases

Satellite imagery reveals the fullest accounting of the destruction yet imagery shows the nighttime attack damaged at least 19 buildings where troops sleep.

It was one of the deadliest nights of the war for U.S. forces. But it wasn't the only attack targeting American troops where they live and sleep. That same week, Iran hit multiple housing units at other U.S. military installations across the region.

The July strikes marked an alarming shift in Iran's tactics and revealed an improvement in the regime's ability to sequence attacks and hit targets with precision. Iran was taking more direct aim at the buildings that house American troops,
