

MOSSBRAE FALLS, near Dunsmuir, Calif., is fed from glaciers on Mt. Shasta and cascades out of lava tubes into the Sacramento River.

Less than half a mile from the city limits of this Northern California railroad town is a natural wonder so enchanting that locals compare it to geologic features in Yosemite or Yellowstone.

“The most beautiful waterfall I’ve ever seen,” said Stephen Decatur, who works in disaster preparedness for the city of Dunsmuir. City Manager Dustin Rief agreed, adding: “And I’ve traveled all over the world.”

Fed from glaciers on Mt. Shasta’s majestic slopes, Mossbrae Falls cascades out of lava tubes and down mossy cliffs into the Sacramento River in ethereal curtains of mist, sending rainbows dancing in all directions.

A breathtaking waterfall — with no legal public access

It’s a natural wonder that promises to be a tourist draw. But local officials have long struggled to secure rights for a trail.

Native tribes have long considered the waterfall sacred. A century ago, it was such a popular destination that Southern Pacific Railroad ran special trains to a locale where well-heeled customers could disembark, soak in the beauty and sip from a natural spring at the top of the falls.

And at Dunsmuir City Hall, where a photograph of Mossbrae Falls adorns the wall, officials consider it a tourist attraction that could be crucial to the city’s economic future. Later this spring, the City Council is poised to vote on declaring Dunsmuir the “Waterfall Capital” of California.

There’s just one hitch: Though Mossbrae Falls sits less

Bay Area workers find tech industry not stable after all

Silicon Valley, once seen as an ideal place to cultivate a career, continues to be hit by workforce reductions.

By QUEENIE WONG

Evans Richardson grew up in Silicon Valley, surrounded by big tech companies that transformed how people live, socialize and work.

As a curious kid, Richardson took apart electronics and put them back together. A career in technology seemed like a natural and safe path after his service in the military.

“Tech was always an industry you go into, you’re going to make a lot of money and you’re never going to get fired,” he said.

For thousands of tech workers like Richardson, those days are over. In March, the 43-year-old Hayward resident was caught off guard when he learned his employer, payment com-

April 30 is also known as ‘Reunification Day,’ in nod to divided Vietnamese views of a contentious war

HO CHI MINH CITY — Military officers stoop to inspect slim green cannons along the Saigon River. Construction equipment whines as workers erect towering bleachers in a downtown park. Fighter jets and helicopters roar above the city in practice drills.

For weeks, Vietnam has been preparing this city for the anniversary of a defining moment in the nation’s history: On April 30, 1975, North Vietnamese forces stormed the Presidential Palace in Saigon, the governing seat of the Republic of Vietnam.

The victory of the communist government over the U.S. allied armies in the south in effect ended a costly, three-decade conflict and unified the country.

Fifty years later, Vietnam is celebrating April 30 like never before. But amid the fanfare of parades, fireworks and airshows, a long-standing debate over what to call the holiday continues, a subtle acknowledgment of the lingering scars of a contentious war.

The official designation is “The Liberation of the South and National Reunification Day,” but it’s known

FCC chair rattles media giants

As Brendan Carr revives news bias complaints and launches inquiries, critics sound alarm.

By MEG JAMES

Amid President Trump’s fusillades against the media, a recent strike stood out: Trump-appointed Federal Communications Commission Chairman Brendan Carr took aim this month at cable giant Comcast, which owns NBC and liberal-skewing MSNBC, in a message on X over the tilt of the news coverage on its TV channels.

Carr accused Comcast of twisting its reporting of Kilmar Abrego Garcia, an immigrant who was mistakenly deported to El Salvador. Trump has alleged Abrego Garcia is an MS-13 gang member (which he denies) and the president’s lieutenants have defied a judge’s order to return him to the U.S., putting the administration increasingly at odds with federal courts.

“Comcast outlets spent days misleading the American public — implying that Abrego Garcia was merely a law abiding U.S. citizen, just a regular ‘Maryland man,’” Carr wrote in a recent post. “News distortion doesn’t cut it.”

Within days, a conservative legal group echoed Carr’s words in a petition asking the FCC, which governs broadcast licenses, to investigate whether coverage of Abrego Garcia on NBC, ABC and CBS distorted facts.

The case is yet another example of Carr’s dramatic transformation from a low-key communications policy wonk into one of Trump’s staunchest cultural warriors.

Since becoming FCC chairman in late January, Carr has repeatedly poked the corporate owners of ABC, CBS and NBC — networks the president dislikes. Last fall, Trump sued CBS over edits to a preelection “60 Minutes” interview with then-Vice President Kamala
