

Defendants may get charges dismissed

Work stoppage also leads to push for SJC to drop juvenile cases

A judge could dismiss state criminal charges against more than 100 people Tuesday because they can't afford to hire their own lawyers and the courts have been unable to appoint one for them because of an ongoing work stoppage over low wages.

The hearings before a Boston Municipal Court judge were ordered earlier this month by a single justice of the state's highest court, who invoked emergency protocols that require Middlesex and Suffolk counties to dismiss charges against indigent defendants who have had no legal representation after 45 days. Dozens of defendants who had been in custody for at least a week without a lawyer to represent them have already been released over the past couple of weeks.

The protocols were invoked at the request of the state's public defender agency, Committee for Public Counsel Services, and currently only apply to adults charged in district or municipal courts.

However on Monday, the committee filed an emergency petition asking the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court to order Juvenile Court judges in six counties to follow similar protocols and dismiss charges against juveniles who have

Beating by his son led to new purpose

Former judge raises awareness to youths about mental illness

CONCORD, N.H. — The attack came in the middle of the night, so abruptly that John T. Broderick Jr. didn't recognize his own son was the assailant.

By the morning of April 1, 2002, John Christian Broderick, then 30, was arrested and charged with a beating so brutal that it took a surgeon six hours to repair facial fractures he had inflicted, leaving his father unrecognizable to colleagues.

Because his father was a New Hampshire Supreme Court justice, then 54, the country took notice. Overnight, the attack became a national news story.

Many wondered: How did this happen and what had spurred the violence? Months later, the family got an answer: A psychiatrist at a New Hampshire state prison diagnosed their son with depression and severe anxiety.

Now, more than 20 years later, rather

Mayor Wu dominates Kraft in poll

Electoral strength shows across race and other demographics

With just over a month to go before the first votes are cast for Boston mayor, incumbent Michelle Wu enjoys a commanding 30-point lead over her closest rival and has the approval of two-thirds of likely voters, according to a Suffolk University/Boston Globe poll.

The poll of 500 voters likely to participate in the Sept. 9 preliminary election showed a wide gulf between Wu and nonprofit executive Josh Kraft, who drew 30 percent support to her 60 percent. It also showed Wu leading Kraft across age groups and racial demographics, as well as among Democrats, while Kraft pulled ahead with Republicans and independents.

Should they hold, the results suggest Wu and Kraft are likely to advance from the first round of voting in September, which will narrow the field of mayoral candidates from four to two who will compete in November. Two lesser-known candidates, Robert Cappucci and Domingos DaRosa, drew 1 and 3 percent support in the poll, respectively, with 7 percent of likely voters saying they remain undecided.

"All of the ingredients are here to set up a big win for Wu," said David Paleologos, director of Suffolk University Political Research Center, though he cautioned that the poll captured only a snapshot in time.

Many of the voters who identified concerns with the city still indicated they intend to vote for the incumbent Wu, he said.

Judge expresses doubts on US cuts

Challenges Trump administration's linking of funds, fight against antisemitism

The Trump administration's legal case for cutting nearly $3 billion in federal aid to Harvard University was met with skepticism on Monday from a federal judge who described the government's arguments as "a bit mind-boggling" during a high-stakes hearing in Boston.

Harvard sued the Trump administration over the cuts in April, and lawyers for both the university and the government appeared in US

District Court to argue that Judge Allison D. Burroughs should issue a summary judgment in the case in their respective favor.

Burroughs did not issue a ruling on Monday, but in questioning from the bench, she asked the Trump administration how it could make "ad hoc decisions" when "there's no documentation, no procedure" justifying the funding cuts on the basis that Harvard failed to combat antisemitism.

"The consequences for that in terms of constitutional law are staggering," Burroughs said.

Harvard has argued that the Trump administration violated its constitutional rights and that the cuts are a significant blow to critical scientific research.

Michael Velchik, a Department of Justice attorney appearing on behalf of the government, argued that the government has the right to cancel Harvard's grants because of its determination that the university has failed to root out antisemitism on campus, which he said is a priority of the Trump administration.

"Harvard claims the government is anti-Harvard. I reject that," Velchik said. "The government is pro-Jewish students at Harvard. The government is pro-Jewish faculty at Har-

Latest in R.I. health care crisis: Provider postpones screenings in OB-GYN for 300 women

NEWPORT, R.I. — Brittany Spurgas's mother died of breast cancer at age 39. Her grandmother suffered from cervical cancer, which can be detected in regular screenings. But weeks before Spurgas's annual OB-GYN appointment, where she would get that screening, she received a call telling her it had been postponed.

"They said it was because of Rhode Island's ongoing health care crisis, but didn't provide any other details," said Spurgas. "I said I have a longstanding history of cancer in my family and it's very important for me to have these annual exams."

"The lady said, 'You're one of many that has the same kind of story and a lot of you are being impacted, but you'll have to wait,'" said Spurgas.

These cancellations are part of a wider problem within Rhode Island's health care system, where a primary care short-
