

The Boston Globe

Serving our community since 1872

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 2025

A head-spinning shift toward new world order

Feeling Trump’s cuts, JFK Library closes for afternoon

By Travis Andersen, Nick Stoico, and Jim Puzzanghera
GLOBE STAFF

The John F. Kennedy Presidential Library in Dorchester abruptly closed Tuesday afternoon after a handful of junior employees were laid off under the Trump administration’s directive to fire probationary employees across the federal government.

The closure came around 2 p.m. and was forced by “the sudden dismissal of federal employees” at the library, according to a statement from the JFK Library Foundation. The foundation said it was “devastated by this news and will continue to support our colleagues and the Library.”

Later Tuesday afternoon, the National Archives and Records Administration, which manages many of the the nation’s presidential libraries, said the Kennedy library will reopen Wednesday.

“The John F. Kennedy Presidential Library and Museum will be open tomorrow, and the National Archives staff looks forward to welcoming guests, visitors, and researchers,” the NARA statement said.

However brief, the closure of the library was one of the myriad knock-on effects from President Trump’s and his billionaire ally Elon Musk’s high-speed efforts to reduce the federal government by summarily dismissing tens of thousands of public employees, freezing or cutting funding, and outright eliminating.

LIBRARY, Page A7

‘We were not invited to this Russian-American meeting in Saudi Arabia. It was a surprise for us, I think for many others as well.’

UKRAINIAN PRESIDENT VOLODYMYR ZELENSKY

US agrees to work with previously isolated Russia on peace in Ukraine, angering Zelensky

By Anton Troianovski and Ismael Naar
NEW YORK TIMES

RİYADH, Saudi Arabia — The United States and Russia moved toward a head-spinning reset of their relationship Tuesday, agreeing to work together on ending the Ukraine war, financial investment, and reestablishing normal relations. The meeting between senior officials from both countries was a striking display of bonhomie after three years of US efforts to isolate Moscow for its 2022 invasion.

After more than four hours of talks, Secretary of State Marco Rubio said both sides had agreed to work on a peace settlement for Ukraine as well as to explore “the incredible opportunities that exist to partner with the Russians,” both geopolitically and economically.

“We weren’t just listening to each other, but we heard each other,” said Sergey Lavrov, Russia’s foreign minister. “I have reason to believe that the American side started to better understand our positions.”

President Volodymyr Zelensky of Ukraine reacted angrily to the meeting, saying he was postponing his own planned visit to Saudi Arabia — he had planned to arrive Wednesday —

RUSSIA, Page A4

SPA/AFP VIA GETTY IMAGES

Secretary of State Marco Rubio greeted Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov during their meeting in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, on Tuesday.

DISBELIEF OVER DISMISSAL

A judge on Massachusetts’ newest immigration court is among more than 20 judges across the nation who have been fired by the Trump administration in recent weeks while the backlog in cases reaches the millions. B1.

A WIN FOR TRUMP

A federal judge declined to bar Elon Musk and his associates from ordering mass firings or having access to data at seven federal agencies, saying 14 state attorneys general didn’t provide specific examples of harm. A6.

Battle lines are so drawn over bike lanes

Around and around Boston residents go

By Beth Teitell
GLOBE STAFF

Josh Kraft was moving through his campaign kickoff announcement, dutifully praising Boston as “the best city in the world” and railing against the incumbent mayor’s alleged failings on affordable housing and the schools, when, finally, he landed on a topic that carbonated the crowd at Prince Hall Grand Lodge in Dorchester: the evil of bike lanes.

“We will offer a common-sense transportation plan to deal with the congestion clogging our streets,” he said, building to what would be the biggest applause line of the event. “And that starts with an immediate pause for all new bike lane construction.”

Make Americans Fight Over Yet One More Thing Again!

If you’re not from around here, and maybe even if you are, the intensity of the lane rage can be hard to grasp.

It is true that bike lanes have devoured parking spots, narrowed roads, and even seized entire lanes. On some streets, they force people to park in spaces weirdly dissociated from the curb. And it’s not stopping there. The city has a self-described “bold plan” for half of residents to live a three-minute walk from a safe and

BIKE LANES, Page A10

ADOBE STOCK

JESSICA RINALDI/GLOBE STAFF

Killington’s new owners spent millions for low-energy snow guns, and they run day and night.

Making the most of winter

Killington’s snow guns provide, now that Mother Nature often won’t

By Janelle Nanos
GLOBE STAFF

KILLINGTON, Vt. — Dave Lacombe’s eyes sparkled like a child waking up to a snow day.

It was 23 degrees on the slopes of Killington. The parking lot was packed, the base lodges bustled, and a steady beep of skiers swiping their passes echoed from the lift lines. Up top, a growing mass of tiny dots descended like Plinko balls down the trails as the snow continued to gently fall. The wind whipped and the air felt charged: 5 inches of snow had fallen overnight, and it was the first powder day of the season.

But while a few inches was nice, it was a mere dusting, relatively speaking, on the giant mountain. The skiers and snowboarders still needed a solid base layer to carve on, so Lacombe had been working toward this day for weeks.

As Killington’s snow surface manager, he’s been the resident alchemist at New England’s largest ski resort since 1977, and it’s his job to coax snow onto the slopes even when the heavens don’t abide. So on that Thursday morning last month, what excited him the most was not the fresh powder but a sharp dip in temperature after a warm wet week. It was snow-making weather, and Lacombe grinned as he watched a cascade of crystals drop 30 feet from a snow-making tower near the base.

CHARLES SANTRY,
HKD Snowmakers

SNOW, Page A7

Boston College, the largest Catholic university in New England, elected a new president, choosing a priest who has worked on the campus for 23 years, and maintaining a tradition of Jesuit leadership since 1863. B1.

A day later, officials were still marveling that all 80 people on board survived when a jet turned over after landing in Toronto. A3.

Boston is taking a step closer to a WNBA team, with word that an ownership group led by actor/singer Donnie Wahlberg and former NBA player Michael Carter-Williams is planning an offer for an expansion team. C1.

It’s easy to forget that actual people are working the drive-through window and some of them deserve a break, writes Devra First. G1.

Slip sliding always

Wednesday: Bearable, at last. High 30-35. Low 10-15.

Thursday: A few flurries. High 25-30. Low 20-25.

Sunrise: 6:35 Sunset: 5:22
Weather and Comics, G6-7.

VOL. 307, NO. 50

Suggested retail price
$4.00

