City police deployment study finally in the works

Will help department in determining where officers are needed

By Sam Charles

Chicago Tribune

After years of fits and starts, a study which will help the Chicago Police Department determine which neighborhoods see additions or subtractions in officer deployment is at last in development.

The study has been a political hot potato for years, and city leaders will soon face the question of how to distribute the department's limited number of police officers in an effective way that satisfies the city's array of constituencies — and legal obligations.

The workforce allocation study won't be finished until year's end. But of CPD's roughly 11,000 sworn police officers, more than half are assigned to the department's 22 patrol districts and are potentially subject to movement.

Little in city government can be more controversial than where officers are stationed, and any significant shifting is likely to bring an outcry.

Ald. Marty Quinn, 13th, said his constituents have for years been forced to stomach slow response times for emergencies as the district's beat cops are often overloaded with calls. Quinn noted that the resident population in the Chicago Lawn District in his ward is far higher than that of the neighboring Englewood District.

Like the Harrison District on the West Side, the Englewood District has for years remained one of the most violent in the city. CPD has 339 patrol officers assigned to Englewood, according to OIG. That equates to 656 officers per 100,000 residents — by far the highest number within any patrol district.

"In certain areas of the city, you could make an argument they're overpoliced, and in my area we're underpoliced drastically," Quinn told the Tribune. "There is a ques-

'THEY WILL NOT BREAK US'

Chicago becomes an epicenter of resistance amid Trump's immigration crackdown

By Nell Salzman, Angie Leventis Lourgos and Laura Rodríguez Presa | Chicago Tribune

The TikTok video went viral early Monday: A brief recording appeared to show a half-dozen federal agents, one with the acronym for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement emblazoned on his back, walking past a street of brick bungalows in a western suburb of Chicago.

The group included one young woman wearing civilian clothing and a white puffer coat, a sharp contrast to the men in black surrounding her.

"ICE in Berwyn bright and early. Right during school drop offs," said a caption to the clip, which had been circulated more than 10,000 times. "Some had the ice logo covered. This breaks my heart."

Another social media post alerted viewers that immigration officials were believed to have been spotted near a high school in Cicero. The message also mentioned that a young woman in a white winter coat was seen among the uniformed agents.

"(Be) safe my people, and if ya'll see a girl in a white puffy jacket knocking at your door, do not open," the post read. "She is with them and I don't know her part in this but I feel like they're using her to knock on people's doors so they open up for her, and then the agents come out."

As President Donald Trump's immigration crackdown grips the Chicago area in fear, a burgeoning resistance movement has also emerged here to challenge — as well as evade — immigration enforcement.

From statements of defiance by local leaders to an unofficial network of tips and alerts on various social media sites, Chicagoland has become an epicenter of opposition to the president's immigration agenda.

Nonprofits have ramped up education campaigns to inform undocumented residents of their rights. A Chicago organization has launched a multilin-

What will be Johnson's playbook against Trump?

So far, mayor using fiery rhetoric while navigating fine line

By Alice Yin and Jake Sheridan

Chicago Tribune

Over the past decade, the job description for the mayor of Chicago has included a new duty: responding to Donald Trump.

The question before Brandon Johnson is, how does the freshman mayor come out on top against a reality TV-bred GOP president made famous for breaking the rules?

Mayor Rahm Emanuel took a typically combative approach, kicking off his relationship with the White House by mocking Trump's fixation with the crowd size at his 2017 inauguration.

Emanuel's successor, Lori Lightfoot, went with political theater when she sought to upstage Trump's new Chicago director of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement in 2019 by hastily calling a dueling news conference outside the agency's downtown office.

Now, Johnson must chart his own playbook on how to stand up for the city's liberal values against a Republican president who has pointedly attacked Chicago for years.

Johnson is doing so on the fly during the early days of a second Trump term that's already disrupted Chicago with a dizzying array of immigration raids targeting area residents and White House orders jeopardizing funding for local projects and more.

So far, the progressive chief executive of America's third-largest city appears to be walking a fine line between using the fiery underdog rhetoric that boosted

"That White House is being ran in one of the most raggedy forms of government that I've ever seen. If anybody is questioning whether or not what our country would look like had the Confederacy won, there should be no question now. They want us to be afraid. Do not be afraid, Chicago."

— Chicago Mayor Brandon Johnson
