Hats off — and I mean way, way off

Being cold is a pretty poor excuse for desecrating your head. Isn't it?

CHRISTOPHER MUTHER

There are a lot of things that are horrible about winter: chapped lips, icy sidewalks, that one glove that thinks it's David Copperfield and disappears, leaving you with a menagerie of useless, mismatched gloves. But winter hats, well, they make this time of year even more unbearable.

It's as if a mad scientist sat in a lab, rubbed his hands together in a sinister manner, and sneered, "What article of clothing can I invent that makes everybody look terrible?" After some experimentation and a few evil cackles, he started spitting out a string of sartorial monstrosities. Think Crocs, day-use pajama bottoms, and fleece vests . . . so many vests. Then there are winter hats. Winter hats are particularly Knit beanies with the dreaded pom-poms are an affront to some people. And then again, some slightly more secure people don't worry about vanity when it's winter.

Trump storms, Harvard carries on

Latest demand — $1b — after story seems to be just more of the same on campus

CAMBRIDGE — First, President Trump wanted $500 million from Harvard, back in August. Then before long, he declared his administration and the school were close to a deal to settle a litany of supposed charges, including allowing anti-semitism to fester on campus.

Wait, no, they weren't close after all. Then it was a demand for Harvard to pay $200 million, only for the talks to stall again. For those on campus, the unending cycle seemed a little too on the nose to the movie "Groundhog Day," where a TV weatherman relives the same day over and over again.

Then late Monday night — on the actual Groundhog Day — shortly after The New York Times reported Trump had dropped his demand for any payment, the president upped the ante: He said Harvard should have to pay his administration $1 billion and even called for unspecified criminal charges against the university.

The on-again, off-again dispatches have become so frequent for Harvard students, faculty, and staff that some on campus treat them like background noise, while others wonder whether the fight with the federal government will ever end.

"At this point, people are a little desensitized

SPRINGFIELD
The vision is grand. In this city with a reputation as a down-on-its-luck former manufacturing hub, where the median income is $53,000 and a quarter of residents live in poverty, in a spot where there are now boarded-up storefronts, just up the street from a shuttered strip club and closed bar and grill, Raipher Pellegrino envisions a block of new and eclectic restaurants.

A well-known attorney and former Springfield city councilor, Pellegrino goes down the list of what will be here: a bistro, a cafe, a Caribbean fusion place, a live music hall, a vegan eatery, a cigar lounge with a private club in the back, another restaurant on the second floor. There is already a Louisiana-inspired restaurant and a hookah lounge operating on the block.

"We're not allowing any duplication of style," he said recently during a tour of the block.

His plan has the potential to transform this particular nook of the third-largest city in the state. He is

Healey pushed by own party to do more to counter ICE

By Samantha J. Gross and Matt Stout

Governor Maura Healey last week gathered dozens of elected officials, advocates, and clergy to announce a stand against their own federal government: No longer, the governor said, should Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents be allowed to make warrantless civil arrests in court-houses, churches, or schools in Massachusetts.

The plan drew a standing ovation from supporters and derision from conservative critics. It's since elicited something else: demands for more.

Healey's proposal, now pending with the Legislature, hasn't stopped calls from within her own party for the state to go further in countering ICE, highlighting the dual pressures the first-term Democrat is facing as she runs for reelection this year.

She and other state leaders are increasingly being pushed to provide a state-level bulwark against the Trump administration's immigration enforcement, which Healey herself has derided as politically motivated and cruel.

But she also has to balance that against what is legally feasible and politically viable. Federal im-

Hall of Fame's not big enough for Kraft, either

Like Belichick, Patriots owner snubbed

SAN FRANCISCO — A week after news broke that longtime coach Bill Belichick would not be inducted into the Pro Football Hall of Fame this year, Patriots owner Robert Kraft learned he, too, will be on the outside looking in.

A league source confirmed Tuesday that the wait for a gold jacket will continue for Kraft, who, along with Belichick, was among five finalists for the Hall of Fame's class of 2026.

Given the fragile state of the relationship between Belichick and Kraft, an induction ceremony with both had the potential to be awkward. And, a ceremony with one but not the other would have provided juicy conversation fodder.

Instead, neither will be honored when this year's class is announced Thursday in San Francisco, just days before the Patriots play in their 12th Super Bowl, in nearby Levi's Stadium, the 10th under Kraft's ownership.

The remaining Hall of Fame finalists are three "senior" players: Ken Anderson, Roger Craig, and L.C. Greenwood.

The snubs of Kraft and Belichick, who as a tandem have the most Super Bowl wins in the NFL, has prompted significant criticism about the process to be admitted to the Hall, with many advocating for
