Senate votes in key move toward ending shutdown

GROUP OF DEMOCRATS JOIN GOP ON DEAL

Still needs House approval and Trump on board

BY THEODORIC MEYER, RILEY BEGGIN AND MARIANA ALFARO

A key group of Senate Democrats joined Republicans on Sunday night to advance an agreement to end the longest government shutdown in U.S. history.

After bipartisan negotiators struck a deal during a rare weekend session, seven Democratic senators and Sen. Angus King (I-Maine) voted with almost all of the chamber's Republicans to take the first step toward reopening the government. Sunday's vote, which needed 60 votes to pass, is the first of many that will be necessary to pass the agreement in the upper chamber.

But the deal split the party. Senate Minority Leader Charles E. Schumer (D-New York) and House Minority Leader Hakeem Jeffries (D-New York) came out against it.

"This health care crisis is so severe, so urgent, so devastating for families back home that I cannot in good faith support this CR," Schumer said on the Senate floor, referring to the bill, known as a continuing resolution.

Most rank-and-file Democrats also opposed the deal.

Trump administration tells states to pause full SNAP payments

BY MARIANA ALFARO

The Trump administration over the weekend ordered states to stop distributing full food assistance benefits for November to the 42 million low-income Americans at risk of food insecurity — stretching out a fight between the federal government and states as the government shutdown stretches into mid-November.

A memo from the Agriculture Department's Food and Nutrition

Service issued late Saturday night orders states to "immediately undo any steps taken to issue" full payments to recipients of the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program, often called food stamps.

Instead, the White House is demanding that states issue partial payments of about 65 percent of a

Americans facing sticker shock over health costs

Premiums for ACA plans spike across country amid expected expiration of enhanced subsidies

BY PAIGE WINFIELD CUNNINGHAM

Americans are coming face-to-face with the rising health insurance costs at the center of the longest government shutdown in history — and what it means for their pocketbooks next year.

Since open enrollment started Nov. 1, they've been able to buy health plans for 2026 on HealthCare.gov and state-run marketplaces created by the Affordable Care Act. Nearly all are finding they will have to pay more — some, significantly more — for their monthly premiums. Costs are soaring because health insurance is getting pricier and enhanced subsidies Congress approved nearly five years ago are going away. The government is shut down because congressional Democrats won't vote for a spending bill unless it extends subsidies beyond their Dec. 31 expiration date. Senate Minority Leader Charles E. Schumer (D-New York) said Friday that his caucus would vote to reopen the government in exchange for a one-year extension of the subsidies, but Republican leaders dismissed the proposal.

The stakes of this standoff are now apparent to Americans looking to buy health insurance.

Although income-based subsidies remain, they will revert to the lower levels set under the ACA, not the more generous ones offered during the covid pandemic to help SEE OBAMACARE ON A8

As small-money sports draw big bets, corruption follows

From darts to surfing, no competition is too niche for the surge in gambling

BY ALBERT SAMAHA

One day last year, Adebowale Akinyemi Wilson lost an opening round match at the World Table Tennis Contender tournament in Lagos, Nigeria.

It was an obscure contest on the far-flung outskirts of professional sports. But 5,000 miles away in New Jersey, four gamblers were keeping a close eye on it.

The bettors, who had rarely bet on table tennis, had staked more money than they usually wagered. And they'd all placed their bets on Wilson's opponent, a heavy underdog. That was enough for a New Jersey sportsbook to flag those bets as "suspicious," setting in motion a process that would derail Wilson's career as authorities investigated whether he "threw" the match, the gravest sin in sports.

As the betting industry booms and scandals engulf major leagues, sportsbooks in the United States and around the world have expanded their menus, enabling big-money bettors to converge on small-money sports newly available on gambling apps, from international table tennis and lower division soccer to darts and surfing.

That expansion has left a widening pool of players vulnerable SEE BETS ON A10

A 'one and done' gene-editing treatment could cut cholesterol

BY CAROLYN Y. JOHNSON

In a cutting-edge medical experiment, a small group of people who had high cholesterol despite taking conventional drugs to lower it saw significant reductions in two major risk factors for heart disease after receiving a single gene-editing treatment at the highest dose.

The study, funded by CRISPR Therapeutics, is an early-stage clinical trial with just 15 participants, but it represents a step forward in a bold quest to treat common diseases with a one-time treatment that tweaks people's genes.

A host of powerful tools, propelled by the discovery of CRISPR gene editing, which won the Nobel Prize for chemistry in 2020, has sparked the dream of "one and done" treatments for a host of ailments.

Much of the focus has been on rare genetic diseases, such as sickle cell anemia, or a life-threatening infantile metabolic disorder. The field's leaders see huge opportunities to address common diseases, too.

The safety bar will be high for common health problems with existing treatments, such as lowering "bad" LDL cholesterol and triglycerides, which were targeted in the CRISPR Therapeutics trial.

Art exhibitions are gathering dust amid shutdown

BY KELSEY ABLES

On a Wednesday evening in downtown Washington, Daniel Soma sat alone in a brightly lit, converted retail space surrounded by Australian Indigenous artworks. Dot paintings, sculptures and other works filled the pop-up art gallery, which was wedged between a bank and a men's workwear store.

Looking through the glass windows to the quiet street, Soma, the creative director at the Sydney-based Michael Reid gallery, asked, "Is D.C. always like this?"

Major shows from Korea, Australia set up in D.C. are now stuck in limbo

The temporary exhibition was seeing just four or five visitors a day, Soma said, lower than the gallery hoped when it started planning the show over a year ago — when sending 30 First Nations artworks to a lobbying district on the other side of the planet made sense.

Washington's National Gallery of Art was expected to open what it is calling the largest exhibition of Australian Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander art outside of the continent on Oct. 18, and "the whole intention for our exhibition was to sort of ride on the coattails and shadow this major opening," said Toby Meagher, the gallery's managing director.

They had big plans. They'd network at the National Gallery of SEE MUSEUMS ON A7

Justice Dept. under strain after exodus of attorneys

Agency, once a magnet for top law graduates, is struggling to fill positions

BY PERRY STEIN

The Justice Department has lost thousands of experienced attorneys since the start of the Trump administration and has backfilled a fraction of the open jobs, with the process snarled by a lack of qualified candidates, bureaucratic delays and hiring freezes, according to people familiar with hirings in the department.

Last year, roughly 10,000 attorneys worked across the Justice Department and its components, including the FBI. Justice Connection, an advocacy group that has been tracking departures, estimates that about 5,500 people — not all of them attorneys — have quit the department, been fired or taken a buyout offered by the Trump administration.

The department did not provide a breakdown of attorney departures, but officials did not deny that widespread vacancies exist.

The department's struggle to fill vacancies reflects a dramatic shift for a law enforcement agency that has long attracted high-performing alumni from the nation's top-ranked law schools and law firms.
