

Chicago Tribune

QUESTIONS? CALL 1-800-TRIBUNE

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 2025

BREAKING NEWS AT CHICAGOTRIBUNE.COM

High court moves cautiously on Guard case

White House wants justices to overturn lower court order that sidelined troops in Chicago area

By Daniel C. Vock
Chicago Tribune

WASHINGTON — President Donald Trump has been able to depend on the U.S. Supreme Court's conservative majority to uphold his unprecedented broad use of executive power. But when it comes to sending the National Guard into Illinois, there are signs a Trump victory might not be a slam dunk. Unlike in many of the administration's other high-profile legal battles, the high court has moved cautiously on the Illinois dispute. The justices have given lawyers until Monday — two weeks after issuing their October order — to file additional briefs, a sharp contrast to the three-day turnaround the court allowed when the case first landed on its docket. The Trump administration is asking the court to overturn lower court decisions that effectively sidelined National Guard troops from Illinois, California and Texas during the Trump administration's immigration enforcement surge in the Chicago area. Trump's Justice Department argues the lower court action "improperly impinges on the President's authority and needlessly endangers federal personnel and property." Citing potential violence, department lawyers urged the court to "grant an immediate administrative stay." But the Supreme Court is still considering the department's request several weeks after it was filed. Given the Monday deadline for additional filings and another week for responses, the justices indicated they would likely rule on the emergency application no sooner than mid-November. It's a sign, court observers say, that the conservative majority on the court appears split on how to handle the case. Otherwise, the justices would have acted already.

■ Pepper-sprayed Berwyn family rattled after getting caught up in federal blitz, Chicagoland, Page 3

Turn to Court, Page 4

BEARS 24, GIANTS 20

EILEEN T. MESLAR/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

RUSH TO VICTORY

Bears quarterback Caleb Williams celebrates as he walks off the field after beating the Giants 24-20 at Soldier Field on Sunday. Williams scored a touchdown with a 17-yard run late in the fourth quarter, giving the Bears the lead after trailing 20-10. Story in Chicago Sports

Climate summit to stress lack of progress

2015 Paris deal set path to slow warming, but results slow

By Seth Borenstein
Associated Press

BELEM, Brazil — The world has changed dramatically in the decade since leaders celebrated a historic climate agreement in Paris in 2015, but not quite in ways they expected or wanted. Earth's warming climate has gotten nastier faster than society has been able to wean itself from burning the coal, oil and natural gas that emits carbon pollution that triggers global warming, several scientists and officials said.

There's been progress — more than 2 degrees Fahrenheit has been shaved off future warming projections since 2015 — but the lack of enough progress will be a big focus as the COP30 summit starts Monday and for the next two weeks as diplomats gather in Belem, Brazil, for the annual United Nations climate negotiations.

"I think it's important that we're honest with the world, and we declare failure," said Johan Rockstrom, director of the Potsdam Institute for Climate Research in Germany. He said warming's harms are happening faster and more severely than scientists predicted.

"We're actually in the direction that we established in Paris at a speed that none of us could have predicted," said former U.N. climate chief Christiana Figueres, who helped shepherd that deal, which requires countries to come up with plans to fight warming.

But the speed of humanity's climate-fighting effort is slower than the acceleration of climate's harms, she said, adding that means that "the gap between the progress that we see on the ground and where we ought to be, that gap is still there and widening."

U.N. Environment Program Executive Director Inger

Turn to Climate, Page 4

WINNETKA

Couple's breadfruit program bears hope

In hurricane-torn Jamaica, resilient trees help feed residents

By Adriana Pérez
Chicago Tribune

After Hurricane Melissa's exceptionally strong winds subsided, the roots of breadfruit trees clung deep into the fertile Jamaican soil — offering hope and a step toward food security in the future.

For the past 16 years, Mary and Mike McLaughlin, Jamaican natives who now live in Winnetka, have helped plant almost half a million fruit trees — mostly non-native breadfruit — across the Caribbean and Africa, about 250,000 of those in Jamaica alone. Despite its resilience, breadfruit has long been an underutilized source of food, Mary McLaughlin said.

The couple's Trees That Feed Foundation aims to expand its use as a crop in locations vulnerable to extreme weather events that are intensifying because of human-made climate change. Several rapid scientific analyses found Hurricane Melissa was made more likely and intense because of global warming from fossil fuels.

"It's one of the worst hurricanes — well, it's the worst hurri-

Turn to Breadfruit, Page 6

Customers check out pastries Wednesday at Léa French Café's new location, which opened in May on Michigan Avenue in Chicago's Loop. EILEEN T. MESLAR/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

'A recovery has started'

Entrepreneurs are setting up cafes, coffee bars and stores in the Loop

By Brian J. Rogal
Chicago Tribune

A group of scrappy entrepreneurs is taking advantage of the Loop's slow but steady recovery, opening dozens of new downtown restaurants and stores this year.

More workers are venturing to the Loop several days each week, and tourists flooded the Riverwalk and other top downtown attractions over the summer, boosting confidence and making it a bit easier for small-business owners to launch new ventures, said Colleen Wagner-Caulliez, co-owner of Léa French Café, which in May opened a new location at 20 N. Michigan Ave. "We do see foot traffic is better year on year, and even week on week, so it's going in the right direction," she said. "Even a few years ago, I would say there was a lot more risk, because we were all still wearing masks and had no idea what was going to happen."

Restaurants and other retailers still face many challenges. The Loop's daytime working population is well below pre-pandemic levels, the overall retail vacancy rate remains near its historic high and older properties in the Central Loop are still lined with "For Rent" signs.

But clusters of new restaurants, cafes, coffee bars and clothing stores are popping up in healthier areas, especially near the West Loop's new office buildings, or on tourist-heavy blocks such as State Street and North Michigan Avenue. More

Turn to Loop, Page 2

INSIDE

Snowstorm to make commute difficult

An early-season storm was expected to dump several inches of snow across the Chicago area overnight and into the Monday morning rush hour, leading to chaotic and dangerous travel conditions. Page 2

Convicted former McCook mayor dies

Jeffrey Tobolski, whose terms as both mayor of McCook and as a member of the Cook County Board ended amid a federal corruption case, died Sunday, two months before his prison sentence was to start. Page 10

TODAY'S WEATHER

High 35 Low 26

Complete Chicagoland forecast on Page 12

$4.00 city and suburbs and elsewhere
178th year No. 314 © Chicago Tribune

