

The Boston Globe

Serving our community since 1872

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 2025

Amid ICE crackdown, students targeted

Advocates say safety issues could escalate to ‘school-to-deportation pipeline’

By Marcela Rodrigues and Lea Skene

GLOBE STAFF

After a Chelsea teenager got arrested for fighting at school in May, his father rushed to the local police station to pick him up.

It was a call no parent wants to get, but the stakes were even higher than usual. In a matter of minutes, both father and son were detained by Immigration and Customs Enforcement. Originally from Honduras, the 15-year-old was sent to an immigration detention center in Texas while his father was held at the Plymouth County Correctional Facility. The father, who has a pending asylum case, was released in June. It’s not known whether the son remains detained.

Another Chelsea High School student was also accused in the same fight, detained by ICE, and sent to a detention facility in California. Police have released few details about the fight, but officials said there was a knife involved. It was unclear whether the two youths were criminally charged for the fight.

Both cases, outlined in court records, highlight the heightened risks facing immigrant families under the second Trump administration’s mass deportation agenda.

As ICE maintains a robust presence across the Boston area, immi-

ICE, Page A6

Senators in deal to end shutdown

Take initial vote to advance measure; status unclear on subsidies for health care

By Catie Edmondson and Michael Gold

NEW YORK TIMES

WASHINGTON — The Senate on Sunday night took the first step toward ending the longest shutdown in US history, after a group of Democrats broke their party’s blockade and voted with Republicans to advance legislation to reopen the government.

The 60-40 vote paved the way for the spending agreement to begin making its way through Congress, where it would still need to be debated and passed by the Senate, win approval in the House, and be signed by President Trump to bring the shutdown to a close.

Eight senators in the Democratic caucus voted to advance the measure, which would fund most federal agencies through January. That indicated there were enough votes to end weeks of gridlock that has shuttered the government for 40 days, leaving hundreds of thousands of federal workers furloughed, millions of Americans at risk of losing food assistance and millions more facing air travel disruptions.

But the deal prompted a quick and fierce backlash among Democrats, many of whom were livid that their colleagues had backed down from the party’s central demand in the shutdown fight: the extension of health insurance subsidies

SHUTDOWN, Page A5

Trump and food help

The president ordered states to stop providing full SNAP aid. A2.

‘A total mess’

For locals, the impasse is an exercise in chaos. B1.

Colleges find link to federal help in tatters

Education Department not only cuts aid but also leaves administrators in dark

By Diti Kohli

GLOBE STAFF

In 1980, the University of Massachusetts Boston opened a student support office, funded by a steady stream of federal dollars. Five hundred students — who qualify each year by being low-income, having learning disabilities, or being the first in their family to attend college — benefit from the financial aid counseling, peer tutoring, and laptop loans it offers.

Then, in July, the money vanished when the Department of Education yanked millions in grants away from student outreach programs during the dramatic cutback to the agency.

“It was a difficult moment for a lot of us,” said Franklin Ortiz, a UMass Boston academic adviser, “because we just did not know what the next month or so was going to look like.”

The dismantling of the Department of Education has left Massachusetts colleges that rely on the federal government for assistance — including routine approvals for new programs and financial aid — scrambling.

EDUCATION, Page A6

CRAIG F. WALKER/GLOBE STAFF

Paty Garcia and her husband, Jorge Lopez-Avila, will take their pets with them to Mexico and see a veterinarian there.

MORE THAN A PET PEEVE

Skyrocketing veterinary bills blindside owners, prompt a rethinking of care

By Dana Gerber

GLOBE STAFF

As the price of veterinary care skyrockets, some pet owners in Massachusetts are taking drastic measures to afford the cost of tending to their furry friends. In Paty Garcia’s case, that includes crossing international borders.

Next month, Garcia and her husband will traverse about 2,300 miles by car to their native Monterrey, Mexico, to visit their families over the Christmas holidays. The Cambridge residents are also bringing their three dogs — Lola, Billy, and Romina — so they can get dental cleanings for a fraction of the price it would’ve cost at their Massachusetts veterinary practice.

In Mexico, Garcia said, the procedure will cost about $250 a pooch. Their quote from their usual Boston vet for Billy, for what Garcia believes will be nearly identical care? More than $4,000.

“It blew me away,” said Garcia.

While veterinary tourism is a particularly unorthodox route, Garcia’s sticker shock is becoming an increasingly common experience among pet owners. Since September 2020, the price of veterinary care has shot up 43 percent, according to the US Bureau of Labor Statistics. That’s well above the 25 percent increase in overall inflation, and more than double the rise in vet costs over the previous five-year period.

“It wasn’t a luxury when we started out,” said Plymouth resident Ashleigh Bennett.

VETERINARIANS, Page A7

For youngster, going anywhere on the T is a trip to wonderland

This rider of the rails, 10, finds following for adventurous videos

By A.Z. Madonna

GLOBE STAFF

Complaining about Boston’s sometimes slow, often screechy, historically unreliable train and subway system might as well be an official pastime in these parts, right up there with drinking iced coffee in winter.

But 10-year-old Makai King lives in a whole different world. Put simply, he loves the MBTA: the subway, the buses, the stations and stops, and especially the commuter rail. He knows MBTA history and trivia. He’s endeared himself to conductors and ticket takers. At home, he makes model stations and locomotives from Amazon boxes. And whenever he can, he dons a Keolis cap that’s a size or two too big and, with his mother, Michelle, at his side, leaves their Roxbury home to get on a train — sometimes just for the pleasure of riding it.

ANDREW BURKE-STEVENSON FOR THE BOSTON GLOBE

“I know pretty much everything about the T,” he said nonchalantly on a recent trip to Back Bay Station.

With his mother’s help, he’s taken to documenting his

MBTA, Page A7

Makai King looked for landmarks while riding the commuter rail from South Station to Back Bay Station.

VOL. 308, NO. 133

*

Suggested retail price
$4.00

Monday mourning

Monday: Early showers. High 57-62, low 43-48.

Tuesday: Much cooler. High 40-45, low 35-40.

Sunrise: 6:29. Sunset: 4:27.

Weather and comics, D4-5.
Obituaries, B6.

After hours of firefighting, a million gallons of water, and a state of emergency, a fire in Amherst was under control. B1.

A woman was charged $1,780 for Doobie Brothers tickets she didn’t order. Her credit card refused a refund. The Fine Print. D1.

Israel received the remains of a soldier killed in the nation’s previous war in Gaza 11 years ago. A3.

Paul Tagliabue dies. The lawyer served as NFL commissioner for 17 years. B6.

STREAKING PATS — Josh Williams’s touchdown reception helped lead the Patriots over the Buccaneers, 28-23, in New England’s seventh straight win. C1.

MATTHEW J. LEE/GLOBE STAFF