

“All the News
That’s Fit to Print”

The New York Times

THE WEATHER
Today, cloudy, showers and thunderstorms, flooding possible, high 80.
Tonight, showers diminish, low 71.
Tomorrow, cloudy, a thundershower, high 82. Weather map, Page B12.

VOL. CLXXV No. 60,989

© 2026 The New York Times Company

THURSDAY, AUGUST 27, 2026

Prices in Canada may be higher

$4.00

PRABIN RANABHAT/AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE — GETTY IMAGES

Trishuli Bazar, Nepal, on Wednesday after a torrent swept the border with Tibet. At least 160 were killed, with hundreds missing.

Glacier Snaps, Loosing Flood In Himalayas

This article is by Binod Ghimire, Leo Sands and Michael Levenson.

KATHMANDU, Nepal — The wave came without warning. A giant torrent of mud, water and ice, it smashed through buildings, swept away buses, snapped bridges into pieces and engulfed people who tried to run but were overtaken by its destructive force. When it was over on Wednesday, at least 160 people had been killed and hundreds more had been left missing on the border between Nepal and Tibet, a rugged region of lush, green river gorges surrounded by the highest peaks in the world, in the snowy Himalayas.

Initial assessments by geologists and glaciologists indicated that an enormous chunk of ice — possibly 2,000 feet wide — had snapped off a glacier at an altitude of 17,000 feet and tumbled thousands of feet into a river valley below. Along the way, the avalanche pulverized itself into a fast-moving barrage of ice and rock that crushed everything in its path. “The bottom looks like a bomb exploded — it’s just deposits from the broken-up glacier,” said Daniel Shugar, a geologist at the University of Calgary in Canada who studied satellite imagery of the disaster zone.

Shaking in the area, at first recorded as a 4.4-magnitude earthquake, was actually caused by the landslide itself, according to the United States Geological Survey. The shaking from the landslide ultimately registered at a magnitude of 5.2, the agency said.

Nepali officials said they had no advance warning before violent floods of water and mud, un-

Continued on Page A7

F.D.A. Nod for Promising Pancreatic Cancer Pill

This article is by Gina Kolata, Rebecca Robbins and Carolyn Y. Johnson.

The Food and Drug Administration approved a new drug for advanced pancreatic cancer on Wednesday, ushering in a new era of treatment for a disease that has long been considered one of the most hopeless in medicine.

The drug, taken as two pills a day, is the first of its type and has electrified cancer specialists and patients. It is not a cure, but it is the first treatment to substantially extend the lives of patients with pancreatic cancer.

Survival Time Doubled for Trial Patients

The drug, daraxonrasib, is made by Revolution Medicines and will be sold under the brand name Rasonque. It was approved for patients who have metastatic pancreatic cancer and have already tried chemotherapy. In a key clinical trial, participants who got daraxonrasib lived for a median of over 13 months, compared with less than seven months for those who got chemotherapy. Some patients who have gotten the drug through clinical trials have lived for years.

“We’ve never seen a benefit like this,” said Dr. Anna Berkenblit, the

Continued on Page A13

NEWS ANALYSIS

Growing Defiance of Trump Flips the Script

By PETER BAKER

This is a summer movie that’s been seen before: President Trump makes demands. When the other side does not give him what he wants, he escalates with bombastic threats of crippling punishment. The other side surrenders.

Except that Mark Carney, the prime minister of Canada, evidently has not read the script. His refusal to buckle in the face of Mr. Trump’s trade ultimatum even at the cost of retaliatory tariffs has flipped the narrative of the president’s second term. Instead of giving in, Mr. Carney is testing whether defiance is a viable strategy against Mr. Trump.

At Home and Abroad, Less Willingness to Yield to Demands

The age of capitulation that defined Mr. Trump’s return to office may be starting to fade. World leaders and domestic institutions are, in some cases at least, showing less willingness to submit to Mr. Trump’s will. European leaders have refused to join his war with Iran. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of Israel flatly rejected his Gaza plan. Gulf Arab states forced him to abandon plans to charge a shipping toll in the Strait of Hormuz.

Universities and law firms are rebuffing his directives rather than signing on the bottom line. Bond markets are rebelling against his fiscal policies. Even the ABC network, whose $16 million payment to settle a Trump lawsuit was seen as an early example of yielding to the president, has discovered that it did not buy peace and is now suing his administration for threatening its broadcast licenses.

Continued on Page A14

Family Tension: Football Dream Vs. C.T.E. Data

By JULIET MACUR

Living in Midland, Texas, where football and its Friday night lights are king, Greta Braker had braced for this moment.

Her son, Thomas, a seventh grader, wanted to play tackle football.

Thomas had played chess and practiced taekwondo. But last year, despite repeated warnings about the risks of brain injury in football, he begged to join his school team. And he made what Ms. Braker and her husband thought was a compelling case: Most of the boys in his class had signed up to play.

His parents gave in after considering the alternative — social isolation.

“This is something that we thought long and hard about,” said Ms. Braker, a personal injury lawyer. “His dad and I never wanted him to play football.”

Sighing loudly, she said, “All of this is stressful, man.”

A new study released on Tuesday brought even more unease to the many parents who are considering putting their child in tackle football or already have a child in the sport.

According to that study of hun-

Continued on Page A12

FANS CAN’T QUIT Many Americans seem content to tune out the hazards to N.F.L. players. PAGE B7

META POISED TO PAY UP TO $17.1 BILLION OVER HARM CLAIMS

Deal With 47 States Addresses Addiction of Children to Social Media Sites

By CECILIA KANG and ELI TAN

WASHINGTON — Meta reached a landmark settlement on Wednesday with 47 states, the District of Columbia and U.S. territories, agreeing to pay up to $17.1 billion in penalties and make major changes to its products over claims it endangered children with addictive social media platforms.

In a dramatic capitulation, the owner of Facebook and Instagram agreed to the financial penalties for violating federal child privacy and states’ consumer protection laws, the states announced.

Meta also agreed to limit how long teenagers could spend on its platforms and to bans on features that stoke mental health issues, striking at the heart of the company’s business of engagement for advertising.

“The focus of this case was to protect our kids: stopping notifications and alerts at night and when they are in school, encouraging them to take breaks from social media, protecting them against harmful features,” said Colorado’s attorney general, Phil Weiser, in a statement. The agreement exceeded what most courts might order, he added.

The settlement effectively ends a bellwether federal trial in the U.S. Northern District of California in Oakland, where California, Colorado, Kentucky and New Jersey were seeking roughly $200 billion over accusations that Meta harmed children. The states filed their agreement with Meta on Wednesday morning in that court, and Judge Yvonne Gonzalez Rogers approved it.

Separately, Meta said on Wednesday that it settled with Texas for about $1 billion over similar allegations. The company still faces numerous other lawsuits from school districts and individuals, some of which are scheduled for trial in the coming months.

Meta’s stock rose on the news, closing up just over 1 percent. The company is valued at $1.47 trillion and most recently generated $60.8 billion in quarterly revenue.

The settlement could signal an inflection point for a social media industry that has largely escaped regulatory scrutiny over the harms its products have caused children. The amount, paid in installments over 10 years, is one of the highest ever reached by a tech company to states.

“Meta wouldn’t settle unless it sees the writing on the wall and feels really exposed,” said Nora Freeman Engstrom, a law professor at Stanford University.

The full value of Meta’s payout depends on whether other social media companies also settle with the states and agree to financial penalties and product changes. Meta will initially pay about $12 billion. It will pay an additional $5 billion if Snap, TikTok and YouTube also settle with the states and agree to financial penalties and product changes.

In a call with reporters on Wednesday, Meta’s legal team said the company had negotiated the terms of its settlement to require the other companies to join, setting industry standards that would not single out Meta.

Meta wants to ensure “teens have a safe and productive experience on our platforms,” and it “partnered with state attorneys general to set a new industry standard.” C.J. Mahoney, Meta’s chief legal officer, wrote in a blog post. He implored other companies to settle.

“This framework will only work

Continued on Page A12

LONDON EDWARDS FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mourners left flowers and trinkets and paid their respects outside Dolly Parton’s home in Brentwood, Tenn., on Wednesday.

Southerners Embraced Parton As Embodiment of Their Best

By RICK ROJAS and EMILY COCHRANE

ATLANTA — The unmistakable likeness of Dolly Parton — with bright eyes and hair reaching for heaven — has been immortalized on murals in Nashville. She has been emblazoned on official state license plates on minivans cruising toward Knoxville. And she has been sculpted in bronze outside the courthouse in Sevierville, the little Tennessee town in the Smokies where the legend began.

She inspired drag brunches in Atlanta and a Mardi Gras club in New Orleans, where crowds would put on wigs and boas and sequins in an effort to be just a little more like her.

In the South, where she was born and raised and steeped in long traditions of storytelling and self-deprecating humor that she harnessed into a singular career, Ms. Parton ascended from successful singer and actress into a

Continued on Page A19

PAIN AND TRIUMPH Her songs delivered hope despite life’s hard times. An Appraisal. PAGE C1

NATIONAL A11-19

Paying the Piper in Arizona

Decades ago, Arizona agreed to be first in line for cuts in a deep drought. That time has come.

PAGE A11

Hochul Makes Her Case

Gov. Kathy Hochul believes New York is back. She hopes she has persuaded New Yorkers to re-elect her.

PAGE A17

INTERNATIONAL A4-10

Can Oil Save Argentina?

Thousands are flocking to the Patagonian desert, hoping a petroleum boom there can reverse the nation’s decades of chronic economic instability.

PAGE A5

Orchestrating a Drone Army

Ukraine’s innovative Delta technology pulls together battlefield data to identify and distribute targets.

PAGE A6

ARTS C1-6

Not on the Road Again

Harry Styles’s Madison Square Garden takeover is part of a trend that shifts the cost of touring to fans.

PAGE C1

SPORTS B7-10

An Electric Return to Tennis

After four years away, Serena Williams joined Carlos Alcaraz for mixed doubles at the U.S. Open.

PAGE B8

M.L.S. Raising the Stakes

The league nears an expanded playoff format designed to give more weight to every regular-season game.

PAGE B9

BUSINESS B1-6

A.I. Security Tests Ran Amok

Irregular, an Israeli start-up, worked with Silicon Valley giants to assess their A.I. models before the technology was released. It made a mistake. Then the tests went off the rails.

PAGE B1

New Meaning for ‘Small’

The Trump administration is seeking to expand the definition of small businesses to allow billion-dollar companies to qualify for government loans and other assistance.

PAGE B1

OPINION A22-23

Jad Abumrad

PAGE A22

THURSDAY STYLES D1-6

All Eyes on the Sky

Darkness is the big draw at an eclipse festival in Iceland, but its New Age culture is fascinating, too. Above, Bryndis Helgaddottir, an attendee.

PAGE D6

