

Markey has big lead on Moulton in poll, but . . .

Pressley could give him trouble if she opts to run

By Samantha J. Gross
GLOBE STAFF

Senator Ed Markey enjoys an early cushion against Representative Seth Moulton in their Democratic primary next year, a new Suffolk University/Boston Globe poll found. Markey's path to reelection appears far more complicated, however, should Representative Ayanna Pressley join the fray.

More than 45 percent of likely primary voters surveyed said they would choose Markey, 79, in next September's primary, compared to 22 percent who say they would pick Moulton, a 47-year-old Salem Democrat.

Still, nearly 31 percent said they were undecided in that matchup — and the math tightens dramatically with the inclusion of Pressley, the progressive Boston Democrat who has not ruled out launching her own challenge.

In a hypothetical three-way primary, voters gave Pressley an edge over Markey, 35 percent to 34 percent, with Moulton fading to 16 per-

POLL, Page A7

As risks rise, insurers drop homes on N.E. coast

By Kate Selig
GLOBE STAFF

MARTHA'S VINEYARD — Among the decades-old cottages and whimsical "gingerbread houses" of Martha's Vineyard, a storm has been gathering. It's not the kind that tears buildings to splinters or floods low-lying neighborhoods, but it threatens homes all the same.

Insurers are deserting homeowners on the island at rates comparable to the hardest-hit parts of hurricane-prone Florida and wildfire-ravaged California, putting residents at risk of losing the coverage they depend on.

New England is not often thought to be on the front lines of the climate-driven insurance crisis. Yet from Connecticut to Maine, coastal communities are flashing warning signs: premiums climbing at dizzying rates and scores of policies abruptly dropped.

Climate change has fueled an unprecedented rise in costly disasters, making it one of the biggest financial threats to insurers. Over the last five years alone, New England has suffered more than 40 disasters with losses exceeding a

INSURANCE, Page A6

Bus crash video puts focus on driver

He doesn't appear to be watching before fatally hitting 5-year-old crossing in front

By John Hilliard
GLOBE STAFF

The driver of a Boston Public Schools bus that struck and killed a Hyde Park kindergartner in April was seemingly not looking straight ahead at the road when the vehicle ran over the boy, according to a video recording viewed by the Globe.

That recording shows the driver did not appear to be watching the boy, 5-year-old Lens Arthur Joseph, and his 11-year-old cousin after they disembarked from the bus the afternoon of April 28. He also does not appear to watch where they were going as the pair crossed in front of the vehicle to reach their family's home.

At the moment the boy was pulled under the vehicle, the video taken on-board the bus shows the driver was looking down at the dashboard. The video shows the bus continued rolling for several seconds before the driver finally stopped and appeared to realize something had happened.

The video from the bus, recorded by interior and exterior cameras, has not been publicly released.

BPS equips its buses with cameras that record each day's runs. A person with access to the April 28 video showed the Globe a roughly two-minute portion of that footage that included the deadly incident.

There is no audio in the footage viewed by the Globe. The footage was recorded on safety monitoring cameras and was not visible to the driver while operating the bus.

Just before the crash, the driver missed a turn that would have allowed the bus to drop Lens and his

BUS, Page B4

BIRDS' EYE VIEW

It's that time of year at Bob's Turkey Farm in Lancaster, and Richard Van Hoof, whose late father started the business, held a 32-pound broad-breasted turkey, one of thousands raised and butchered on the farm. At left, one of the colorful male faces as they vie for dominance. The largest turkey raised on the farm was 45 pounds, Van Hoof said.

MGB doctors switch to rival Beth Israel

Affiliation changes reflect discontent in state's largest system

By Jonathan Saltzman
GLOBE STAFF

Six primary care providers at a single Mass General Brigham practice are moving to rival Beth Israel Lahey Health in January, raising to at least 18 the total number of such defections from the state's largest health care system to the second largest in less than a year.

The move, the latest development in the two institutions' fierce rivalry, is expected to cost MGB millions of dollars in revenue. It also represents another symbolic blow to the health system, which has been under fire from some of its own primary care physicians.

"It's relatively unusual for people to change affiliations at all, and particularly from the dominant market player to the second-biggest market player," said Paul Levy, who served as chief executive of Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center from 2002 to 2011. "You want to look into why."

For months, MGB's primary care physicians have publicly criticized their employer's commitment to their field, the most basic kind of medical care. They have complained about pay and benefits, the size of their caseloads, the amount of support staff they get, and how much say they have over how they practice medicine. They have picketed outside Massachusetts General Hospital and Brigham and Women's Hospital, the

HOSPITALS, Page A6

After a book disaster, college library is turning the page

Karen Carreras-Hubbard, who made the unhappy discovery about the mold, is working to rebuild the collection at Berkshire Community College. She's getting plenty of help.

By Brooke Hauser
GLOBE STAFF

PITTSFIELD — Some 40,000 books destroyed by mold and insects — it's a librarian's worst nightmare.

In August, Karen Carreras-Hubbard, coordinator of library services at Berkshire Community College, was going through books that had been in storage when she noticed one cloth-bound cover was coated in white mold.

Then something moved. Unsure what to do, Carreras-Hubbard squashed the first bug. But she saw another one. A colleague went to the environmental studies department, where faculty identified a scavenger beetle. The other pests? Booklice.

"Of course my first thought was going to my head and scratching, and that's not at all what this is," said Christina Wynn, vice president of administration and finance. "These are creatures that feed off the mold that's on the books."

The librarians had heard of bookworms, but booklice? That was new. BCC had just finished a two-year, $4 million-plus library renovation to address longstanding water issues that took a toll on both the building and the collection. The plan was to bring back the books after remediating the library, but it seems all that time living in storage crates allowed the mold to take hold. "Presumably," said Carreras-Hubbard, "it bloomed."

BOOKS, Page A7

Dessert storm

Wednesday: A few showers. High 59-64. Low 40-45.

Thursday: Nice but gusty. High 45-50. Low 31-36.

Sunrise: 6:48 Sunset: 4:14

Weather and Comics, G6-7.

VOL. 308, NO. 149

*
Suggested retail price
$4.00

