

A U.S. CUSTOMS agent confronts protesters at the Coast Guard Island entrance in Alameda on Thursday.

San Francisco ‘surge’ on hold

But East Bay officials, unswayed by Trump announcement, are bracing for more raids.

By Kevin Rector and Jessica Garrison

OAKLAND — President Trump said Thursday that he had called off a planned federal “surge” into San Francisco after speaking with Mayor Daniel Lurie and other city leaders — a dentente that officials and activists in the East Bay said they were not welcomed into and which some saw as potentially enlarging the target on their own communities. Trump’s announcement came amid protests at the entrance to the U.S. Coast Guard base across the bay in Alameda County, where the Department of Homeland Security has begun staging additional forces. It followed a similar announcement by Lurie, who said he had told Trump during a phone call late Wednesday that San Francisco is “on the rise” and that “having the military and militarized immigration enforcement in our city will hinder our recovery.”

Lurie said Trump agreed to call off any federal deployment to the city, and that Homeland Security Secretary Kristi Noem — who is in charge of federal immigration forces — had “reaffirmed that direction” in a conversation with him Thursday morning. Trump said on social media that his administration had been planning a “surge” in San Francisco beginning Saturday, but that Lurie had asked him “very nicely” to “give him a chance to see if he can turn it around,” and that other “friends” of Trump’s in the city had asked him to call it off because they believe Lurie is “making substantial progress.” The president said he told Lurie that he was “making a mistake, because we can do it much faster, and remove the criminals that the Law does not permit him to remove,” but that he had ultimately agreed to pause the surge — in part because Lurie has the support of prominent business leaders Jensen Huang of Nvidia and Marc Benioff of Salesforce. During a Thursday morning briefing less than an hour after Trump’s post, Oakland Mayor Barbara Lee [See San Francisco, A7]

Unions pouring money into the Prop. 50 effort

Labor joins with Democrats against Trump’s redistricting push in red states.

By Seema Mehta

With the fate of President’s Trump’s right-wing agenda at stake, the California ballot measure crafted to tilt Congress to Democratic control has turned into a fight among millionaires and billionaires, a former president, a past movie-star governor and the nation’s top partisans. Californians have been inundated with political ads popping up on every screen — no cellphone, computer or living-room television is spared — trying to sway them about Proposition 50, which will reconfigure the districts of the largest state congressional delegation in the union. Besides opposing pleas from former President Obama and former California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, the state’s powerful, left-leaning labor unions are another factor that may influence the outcome of the Nov. 4 special election. Unions representing California schoolteachers, carpenters, state workers and nurses have plowed more than $23 million into efforts to pass Proposition 50, ac-

ording to an analysis of campaign finance disclosure reports about donations exceeding $100,000. That’s nearly one-third of the six-figure donations reported through Thursday. Not only do these groups have major interests in the state capitol, including charter school reform, minimum wage hikes and preserving government healthcare programs, they also are deeply aligned with efforts by Gov. Gavin Newsom and his fellow Democrats to put their party in control of the U.S. House of Representatives in the 2026 election. “There are real issues here that are at stake,” said veteran Democratic strategist Gale Kaufman, who has represented several unions that have contributed to Newsom’s committee supporting Proposition 50. “There’s always a risk when making sizable donations, that you’re putting yourself out there,” Kaufman said. “But the truth is, on Proposition 50, I think it’s much less calculated than normal contributions. It really is about the issue, not about currying favor with members of the Legislature, or the congressional delegation, or the governor. Even though, of course, it benefits them if we win.” Newsom’s pro-Proposition 50 committee has raised more than $16 million [See Prop. 50, A6]

A FAN CHEERS before a game at Dodger Stadium.

A WEARY L.A. FINDS JOY, HOPE

With return to the World Series, Dodgers bring excitement to city

By James Rainey

L.A. feels ready for this moment. Ready for its Dodgers. Ready for Mookie and Freddie and Yoshi and Teoscar and, of course, ready for The Show, Shohei Ohtani, the humble giant who already has cemented himself as one of the city’s all-time All-Timers. Angelenos feel the anticipation of another World Series, out in force in a sea of Dodgers caps and an armada of cars, with blue Dodgers flags snapping in the wind. One lady even braided her long hair blue and white and declared on social media, “Dodgers braids are World Series ready!” The moment would be huge if it was just about baseball. The Dodgers have lost only one out of 10 playoff games and they’ve done it with panache, and achievements so grand — headlined by Ohtani’s three-homerun, 10-strikeout demolition in the climactic Game 4 against the Milwaukee Brewers — that fans and pundits are straining for new superlatives. But the occasion feels even bigger because of what the city has endured in 2025. It started with the fires that destroyed thousands of homes, continued with federal immigration raids and the unrest in the streets that followed and has stumbled along with a government shutdown that pushed oth-

By Hannah Fry and Rong-Gong Lin II

New questions are emerging about why there were no public warnings before the U.S. Marines fired over Interstate 5 and a major regional commuter rail line as a test run a day before the 250th birthday celebration for the Corps at Camp Pendleton. Friday’s exercise occurred during normal freeway and train operations amid the evening commute — and without any of the precautions taken Saturday, when officials temporarily closed the 5 and suspended rail service. On that day, shrapnel landed on a California Highway Patrol cruiser and motorcycle after an artillery shell exploded in midair prematurely, prompting an investigation from the Marines. Lt. Col. Lindsay Pirek, a spokesperson for the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force, told The Times on Monday the Marines notified the state about plans for Friday’s launching of shells before it fired a total of 30 rounds from its M777 howitzers between 5 and 5:30 p.m. However, state sources told the Los Angeles Times that the messages the Marine Corps sent on Friday actually did not specify that artillery was being fired in a test run on Friday. They said they did not interpret the request as an indication that live rounds would be fired over the freeway in the coming hours. As a consequence, thousands of rush-hour commuters and coastal rail passengers were unaware of the risk as multiple M777 howitzers fired a total of 30 shells over the freeway. “We did not receive a notification that weapons would be fired over the freeway during Friday’s rehearsal,” a spokesperson for the California State Transportation Agency told The Times. The Times has asked the Marines Corps for comment and has yet to receive an answer. The California Department [See Artillery, A6]

Israeli settlement plan may sever West Bank

By Nabil Bulos

EZARIYA, West Bank — Hanging by the desk of the mayor of Bethany — Ezariya, in Arabic — is a blown-up aerial photo from 1938 showing this Palestinian town on Jerusalem’s edge how it once was: Before the Israeli separation wall severed its access to Jerusalem to the west, before the Israeli settlement of Maale Adumim settlement took root nearby, and before a new wall that will soon block it from the east and effectively rend the occupied West Bank in two. Mayor Khalil Abu Al-Rish stared at the photo one recent morning, a cigarette in one hand and a glum look

‘Do that, and there’s no Palestinian state,’ a mayor says

PALESTINIAN Bedouin children with their teacher in Jabal Al-Baba, West Bank, who face displacement.

on his face, then pointed with his other hand out his office window at Ezariya’s bustling main thoroughfare, the primary artery connecting north West Bank cities like Ramallah to Bethlehem and Hebron in the south. “There are 55,000 living in this town. This road alone has 60 cars passing through it every minute, according to our research. The [Israeli] plan now is to shut it down,” he said. “Do that, and there’s no Palestinian state.” “The plan” Abu Al-Rish was referring to is East One or E1, the long-deferred Israeli project that aims to build 3,400 new settlement homes over a 3,000-acre area in the mountains stretching out [See West Bank, A4]

Title defense drives vision of Dodgers dynasty

Team begins quest for a second straight World Series championship. Is it too early to dream of more? SPORTS, D1

Autistic L.A. teen stars in ‘Bugonia’

Aidan Delbis wowed Greek filmmaker Yorgos Lanthimos during his very first audition. ENTERTAINMENT, E1

For the latest news, go to latimes.com.

CÉSAR CANSECO For The Times

Agents detain TikTok streamer

Carlitos Ricardo Parias had been tracking ICE raids and posting videos of immigration operations. CALIFORNIA, B1

Weather

Mostly sunny. L.A. Basin: 78/58. B6

Markets A12
Opinion Voices A13
Comics E4-5

Gambling scandal envelops NBA

By Richard Winton and Salvador Hernandez

NEW YORK — Federal prosecutors unsealed two indictments Thursday outlining an illegal betting scheme that has rocked the NBA and named current and former players, including former Clippers player and current Portland head coach Chauncey Billups, in one of the most brazen sports corruption schemes since online sports betting became widely legalized in the United States. Prosecutors are accusing the Miami Heat’s Terry Rozier and Damon Jones, a retired NBA player and friend of LeBron James, of using private insider NBA information, such as when players would sit out, to help others profit in leveraged bets online. In a separate indictment from the Eastern District of New York, Billups, who played with the Clippers for two seasons and later was a member of Clippers coach Ty Lue’s staff before earning the Trail Blazers head coaching job, is charged with rigging underground poker games that three of New York’s Mafia families backed, authorities said. Rozier and Billups have been put on immediate leave by the NBA, the league announced Thursday. “We take these allegations with the utmost seriousness, and the integrity of our game remains our top priority,” a league statement said. At a news conference [See NBA, A8]