On the eve, and Trump is already in control

This time round, the establishment is giving him more deference

WASHINGTON — When President-elect Donald Trump is sworn in Monday, it won't just signal his return to the White House, it will cement his control of Washington.

Trump's overwhelming influence has been apparent over the week leading up to his inauguration, as the Republican Party, corporate America, and much of the international order have fallen into line behind him — virtually the polar opposite of the circumstances surrounding his first inauguration in 2017, when even members of the GOP establishment were skeptical of him.

Most of his Cabinet nominees seem to be gliding through their confirmation hearings. Prominent CEOs and world emissaries are making pilgrimages to his Florida resort and inauguration to get in his good graces. Dozens of Democrats in the House and Senate have

More change for school with troubled past

Call to close old Southie High triggers memories

When the building on Dorchester Heights in South Boston was first opened more than 120 years ago, hopes were high.

The year was 1901 and Southie residents had pushed for more than a decade to have a high school to call their own. After $300,000 worth of construction, they had it.

At the building's dedication, Dr. William J. Gallivan, chairman of a city committee on high schools, told the crowd the school heralded a "new era in high school studies."

"The South Boston high school is the embodiment through and through of the new education, unique in the educational history of the city," he said.

For decades, the hulking, 160,000-square-foot building has educated children. Its road, at times, has been rocky. Depending on the era, it's been a proud neighborhood anchor, a troubling emblem of lackluster education, and

‘HARD TIMES ARE COMING’

Deportation fears revive painful memories of 2007 immigration raid

NEW BEDFORD — For weeks after Ricardo Gómez Garcia was arrested at his textile job in the largest workplace raid in modern Massachusetts history, his autistic 4-year-old son would scour the family's apartment trying to find him. Mauricio Gutierrez had delighted in his outings with his father — to the park or to pick up treats before dinner. Where had he gone?

The boy could not sleep. He refused to eat, his mother, Dominga Gutierrez Toj, recalled. "He would just look, and search," Gutierrez Toj, 54, said in Spanish on a recent evening at her New Bedford apartment. She tried to reassure Mauricio that everything would be OK.

But it would not be OK, for her small family and hundreds of others in New Bedford whose lives were fractured forever after that late winter morning almost 18 years ago, when Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents swarmed the Michael Bianco Inc. leather goods factory and arrested 361 undocumented immigrants. Some were detained for weeks or months. Many fought long court battles to stay in the United States after they were released. An estimated 150 workers, including many parents of young children, were deported, including Mauricio's father, Gómez Garcia.

The raid had lasting effects on New Bedford, too: a disruption of the labor market, an avalanche of job losses, and new anxiety about immigration enforcement among employers and their workers.

Now, as President-elect Donald Trump

Pioneering survivors of HIV find the years are fast catching up

By Kay Lazar

Daniel Duffy ruefully jokes that he's a catalog of stubborn maladies. At 54, he has atrial fibrillation, chronic heart failure, and a mysterious neurological condition.

But just seven years ago, and despite living with HIV for nearly half his life, Duffy was remarkably healthy, working in Boston as a respiratory therapist, ambitious, and always moving. "Footloose and fancy free," is how he describes it.

Then a stroke out of nowhere sparked a cascade of illnesses that have snowballed. Duffy is among the more than half a million people who were diagnosed with HIV in the 1980s and early 1990s when there were few effective treatments. Studies show this group is aging faster and with more age-related diseases than other 50-plus-year-olds who are virus free.

That's prompting new approaches to care for this wave of pioneers, who survived what was once a lethal disease, only
