

Epstein fallout continues at Harvard

Summers to retire, resign from Kennedy School post

By Brooke Hauser, Laura Crimaldi, and Travis Andersen
GLOBE STAFF

In the end, Lawrence Summers could not evade the drumbeat of revelations that continued to spill from the trove of documents released by the Justice Department showing his close relationship to convicted sex offender Jeffrey Epstein.

A former president of Harvard and US Treasury secretary, Summers announced Wednesday he will retire from his academic and faculty appointments at the end of this academic year, more than four decades after he became one of the youngest faculty members to be granted tenure in school history.

It was a “difficult decision,” Summers said in a statement. “I will always be grateful to the thousands of students and colleagues I have been privileged to teach and work with since coming to Harvard as a graduate student 50 years ago.”

►Files failed to include key materials related to a woman who accused Trump. A2.

As president emeritus and a retired professor, he added, “I look forward in time to engaging in research, analysis, and commentary on a range of global economic issues.”

Summers also resigned from his Kennedy School post as co-director of the Mossavar-Rah-

SUMMERS, Page A7

Images of Jeffrey Epstein (right) and Lawrence Summers (left). Top image is of Epstein with Martin Nowak (middle) and others.

Free flights, business deals: Ties to university ran deep

By Deirdre Fernandes and Tricia L. Nadolny
GLOBE STAFF

When officials at Harvard University in 2019 launched a review of sexual predator Jeffrey Epstein's influence on their institution, they had every reason to fear what they would unearth.

Epstein had given the university $9.1 million, kept his own office at a Harvard lab, and was famously photographed with a wide grin in one of Harvard's signature sweat shirts.

But Harvard officials contained the fallout at the time. They kept the investigation focused on Epstein's donations to the school and relegated to a footnote any mention of the personal relationships he built on Harvard's campus. In subsequent years, when asked about Epstein, school officials repeatedly pointed back to their report.

Then, last fall, the government began releasing the Epstein files.

The documents, which mention Harvard more than 12,000 times, lay bare the stronghold Epstein built within the country's most revered academic institution. A host of university employees, from researchers to the former president, were in his thrall. Some were willing to do his bidding as he showered them with gifts and favors. The documents also reveal a previously unre-

HARVARD, Page A6

‘Things are going so good, and then all of a sudden you remember that you could get taken at any time.’

MARCELO GOMES DA SILVA

PHOTOS BY JESSICA RINALDI/GLOBE STAFF

Marcelo Gomes da Silva gazed up at the dome in the Capitol rotunda during his visit on Monday.

Inspiration and touch of reality

Milford teen leaves speech after he's mentioned in tweet from DHS

By Marcela Rodrigues
GLOBE STAFF

WASHINGTON — From the visitor gallery, Marcelo Gomes da Silva looked down at the House floor, attentively watching President Trump deliver his State of the Union speech. A guest of Representative Seth Moulton, the 19-year-old from Milford was overjoyed to be sharing a room with the nation's most powerful politicians.

“I truly hope that one day I'll be here and I'll be a representative, and then hopefully a senator, as well. That's the dream,” he said.

Wearing a light gray suit, Gomes looked worlds apart from the day he met Moulton for the first time last June, outside of the ICE holding facility in Burlington where he had spent six days detained in volleyball shorts and Crocs.

Gomes embraced his family as he left his Milford home to go to Washington for the State of the Union address.

This week, in Washington for the first time, he met with other members of Congress and talked about his experience in detention and his desire to end ICE operations that target people who, like him, don't have a criminal record.

As he watched the speech, the teen looked for Moulton on the House floor but couldn't find him among the sea of politicians; he was impressed by Rep-

GOMES, Page A10

Tariff ruling punches hole in Trump's calculations

Revenue was supposed to help cover costs of GOP's tax-cut legislation

By Jim Puzzanghera
GLOBE STAFF

WASHINGTON — With the Supreme Court invalidating most of President Trump's tariffs, he and congressional Republican leaders now have a major math problem: Hundreds of billions of dollars in government revenue they were counting on is now in doubt.

The money was supposed to help offset the cost of their sweeping tax-cut legislation enacted last year. Without that revenue, the federal government's budget deficit — already at alarming levels — could balloon even larger. Exacerbating the problem is the potential for refunds of the $175 billion in illegal tariffs that were collected from US importers since Trump put them in place last year.

“They were going to bring in a significant amount of revenue, and this throws a wrench into that,” said Maya MacGuineas, president of the Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget, a nonpartisan fiscal watchdog group.

Her organization estimates the Supreme Court's ruling against the high tariffs Trump levied using the 1977 International Emergency Economic Powers Act will reduce incoming federal revenue

TARIFFS, Page A10

Grandparents' rights are in the spotlight

R.I. case highlights divide over visits with children

By Amanda Milkovits
GLOBE STAFF

PROVIDENCE — The US Supreme Court and the 14th Amendment of the Constitution give parents the right to oversee the care, custody, and control of their children.

But now, a high-profile Family Court trial in Rhode Island is shining a spotlight on a little-known state law about a growing legal debate taking place across the nation: Can lawmakers and judges order grandparents be allowed access to their grandchildren, even if the child's parent does not want that relationship?

After their daughter, Shahrzad “Sherry” Naso, died of cancer in April 2024, Dr. Jila Khorsand and Dr. Siavash Ghoreishi took their son-in-law to court to force him to allow visits with their granddaughter.

They have told the Rhode Island Family Court that Laila, now 4, is their only connection to their daughter. Laila's father, Scott Naso, has said his in-laws' medical care and advice contributed to his wife's death and sickened Laila. Both Khorsand and Ghoreishi have denied wrongdoing.

GRANDPARENTS, Page B3

