

The Boston Globe

Serving our community since 1872

MONDAY, MARCH 3, 2025

At the junction of economics, politics

If protections for migrant workers end, labor crunch could upend merchants

By Katie Johnston
GLOBE STAFF

John's Pizza in Chelsea relies heavily on the city's immigrant population, for customers as well as workers. But sales have decreased 50 percent in the past two months, a drop that owner Jonathan Galvan attributes to people being afraid to leave their homes amid the Trump administration's immigration crackdown.

If temporary protections that have allowed migrants to legally attain jobs are rescinded, the situation could become even more dire. "I wouldn't have any workers," he said.

The reality Galvan faces could play out across Massachusetts, a state where one out of five employees is an immigrant. With thousands of workers at risk of losing their legal status, and a labor shortage that would make it difficult to fill their jobs, the economic impact could be significant. Businesses that rely heavily on migrants with temporary status could shut down, employment specialists said.

President Trump called for mass deportations even before he took office, and immediately started allowing arrests of undocumented immigrants at schools, churches, and other previously protected places, sowing fear in immigrant communities even though such ac-

MIGRANT ECONOMY, Page A7

Vexed vendors

Small businesses wonder how DEI cutbacks at large companies could affect contracts for their wares. D1.

Bench approach

The Justice Department adopts a two-pronged strategy to bypass actions from judges. A6.

Reagan, Trump both promised to cut bureaucracy. Similarities end there.

By Jim Puzanghera
GLOBE STAFF

WASHINGTON — Despite taking office 44 years apart, Donald Trump and Ronald Reagan arrived in the nation's capital aiming at the same hulking target: the federal bureaucracy.

"Government is not the solution to our problem. Government is the problem," Reagan declared in his 1981 inaugural address, a sentiment Trump echoed on Jan. 20 when he said "our government confronts a crisis of trust." They each campaigned on a promise to reduce the national debt by slashing spending, both even calling for elimination of the Education Department.

But their efforts to rein in the federal government in the first weeks of their presidencies have been as different as their personalities. Reagan did it methodically; Trump, chaotically.

Although Reagan issued a federal hiring freeze on his first day in office, he generally moved cautiously despite a dramatically larger electoral mandate and a far more dire economic situation. Within one month, he presented Congress with a 298-page "Program for Economic Recovery" that outlined a comprehensive strategy, including large tax

TRUMP, Page A7

Europe races to fix Ukraine, US split

Follows the volatile blowup between Trump, Zelensky

By Mark Landler and Stephen Castle
NEW YORK TIMES

LONDON — European leaders raced Sunday to salvage Ukraine's ruptured relationship with the United States, with Britain and France assembling a "coalition of the willing" to develop a plan for ending Ukraine's war with Russia. They hope this effort will win the backing of a skeptical President Trump.

Gathering in London at the invitation of British Prime Minister Keir Starmer, the leaders vowed to bolster support for Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelensky after his bitter clash with Trump last week. But several also expressed hope that the two could repair their breach, underscoring Europe's reluctance to cast off a trans-Atlantic alliance that has kept the peace for 80 years.

"We are at a crossroads in history," Starmer said after the meeting. "Europe must do the heavy lifting," he declared, but added, "To support peace, and to succeed, this effort must have strong US backing."

UKRAINE, Page A5

Fears rise of national park disservice

Job cuts dim prospects for state's 250th celebrations

By Brian MacQuarrie
GLOBE STAFF

President Trump's blunt-force attempts to shrink the federal government could soon be tested on the battlefields and historic sites in Massachusetts that are expecting millions of visitors this year for the 250th anniversary of the American Revolution.

Already, national parks in the state are said to be reeling from a rapid flurry of staffing cuts, a halt in critical seasonal hiring, and plummeting morale among workers as a result of the administration's actions.

Several full-time staffers at the parks — including sites in Boston, Lowell, and Minute Man in Lexington, Lincoln, and Concord — have been fired since mid-February, according to three people with direct knowledge of National Park Service activity who requested anonymity for fear of retribution.

In addition, a federal hiring freeze announced shortly after

PARK SERVICE, Page A10

The National Parks of Boston attracts about 3 million visitors annually and includes these sites:

- Faneuil Hall
- Bunker Hill
- Dorchester Heights
- USS Constitution
- African American National Historic Site

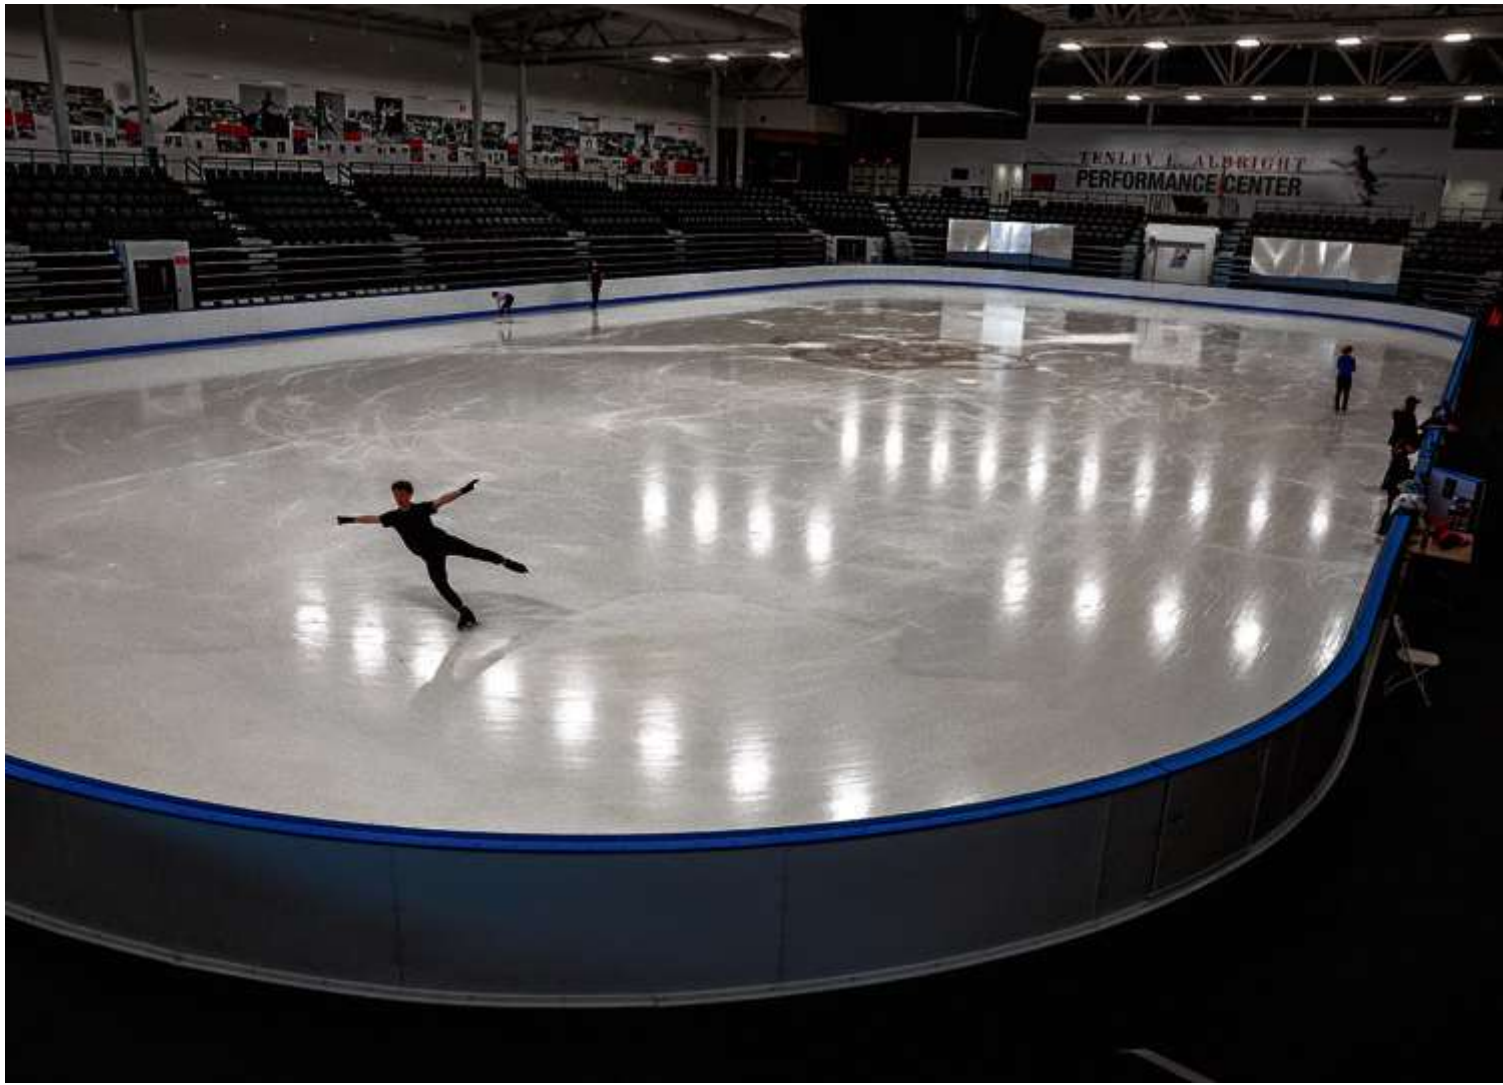

JESSICA RINALDI/GLOBE STAFF

The Bunker Hill Monument in Charlestown is one of several national park sites tied to the Revolutionary War.

'We keep them in our hearts . . . and it feels like we're still skating together.'

ZACHARY LOPINTO, nationally ranked ice skater, on those killed in January's plane crash

PHOTOS BY CRAIG F. WALKER/GLOBE STAFF

Figure skater Zachary LoPinto worked on a routine at The Skating Club of Boston in Norwood.

At skating club, grief looms over the daily training grind

Tight-knit community struggles with deaths of six in plane crash

Skaters have helped set up a memorial honoring Jinna Han, 13, and Spencer Lane, 16, in a hallway where the two would lace up their skates in Norwood.

By Danny McDonald
GLOBE STAFF

NORWOOD — Jin Han wanted to come home. That's what Donna LoPinto remembers most about her last communications with her friend before Han and five others with connections to The Skating Club of Boston were killed last month when their jet collided with an Army helicopter near Washington, D.C.

"It still doesn't feel real," LoPinto said.

Weeks after the tragedy, the club is weathering waves of anguish all the while doing what has made it a standard-bearer for figure skating in America for more than a century. There is palpable grief, to be sure, but also the ever-present grind of athletes striving for greatness.

"We keep them in our hearts while we do it, and it feels like we're still skating together," said LoPinto's son, 16-

SKATING CLUB, Page A10

► Skating community in Boston and across the country gathered in nation's capital for a tribute to victims. C1.

VOL. 307, NO. 62

*

Suggested retail price
$4.00

A beautiful Mon.

Monday: Lots of sun. High 29-34, low 23-28.

Tuesday: Warmer but cloudy. High 45-50.

Sunrise: 6:16. Sunset: 5:37.

Weather and comics, D4-5.

Obituaries, C9.

CHRIS PIZZELLO/INVISION/AP

Mikey Madison (left) took the best actress Oscar at the Academy Awards, one of five statuettes won by "Anora," including best picture and best director. Adrien Brody won the best actor Oscar for his role in "The Brutalist." B6.

Israel halted the entry of all humanitarian assistance into the Gaza Strip in an attempt to force Hamas into altering a cease-fire pact as negotiators sought a more permanent end to the war. A4.

The Boston Housing Authority failed to consistently maintain its public housing in a "safe, and sanitary condition," a federal audit said. B1.

0 947725 4