

Chicago Tribune

QUESTIONS? CALL 1-800-TRIBUNE

THURSDAY, JUNE 5, 2025

BREAKING NEWS AT CHICAGOTRIBUNE.COM

THE TRUMP ADMINISTRATION IMMIGRATION

A clash with ICE

Immigration agents get physical with activists, aldermen at Near South Side facility

Escalation comes amid wave of grassroots resistance across the US to deportations

A family walks away in tears after their mother was detained Wednesday outside a Intensive Supervision Appearance Program office run by Immigration and Customs Enforcement on Chicago's Near South Side. BRIAN CASSELLA/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

By Laura Rodríguez Presa and Nell Salzman
Chicago Tribune

In another sign of escalating tension over President Donald Trump’s immigration policies, community organizers, protesters and several Chicago aldermen clashed with federal agents Wednesday as they detained immigrants outside a U.S. Customs and Immigration

Enforcement office on the Near South Side.
The office in the 2200 block of South Michigan Avenue operates the Intensive Supervision Appearance Program, or ISAP, which is run by ICE. The program utilizes technology, such as ankle monitors, as an alternative to detention, providing enhanced supervision for individuals in immigration proceedings who haven’t been detained.

Organizers were first alerted of ICE activity when Yolanda Chavez, a member of Organized Communities Against Deportations, went into the office for a check-in Wednesday morning and didn’t come out for hours. The organization quickly mobilized supporters outside, said Antonio Gutierrez, president of the nonprofit.
Chavez is from Honduras and has been in the United States for 10 years, Gutierrez said. She has a child and was in asylum proceedings, he added. Gutierrez hasn’t heard from her since she went in. “This is only the beginning,” he said.

By Wednesday afternoon, elected officials, including Aldermen Anthony Quezada, 35th, Byron Sigcho-Lopez, 25th, and Rossana Rodriguez-Sanchez,

Turn to ICE, Page 4

GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Session a mix for Pritzker

Amid some victories, cellphone ban fails

By Olivia Olander and Addison Wright
Chicago Tribune

Entering a legislative session amid questions about whether he’d run for a third term, Democratic Gov. JB Pritzker outlined an ambitious agenda that ended with mixed results.
In a State of the State and budget address in February that will be remembered mainly for Pritzker invoking Nazi Germany to describe the new presidential administration, there was also a litany of policy initiatives — some of which passed and will now have a tangible impact on Illinoisans and others that went nowhere in the spring legislative session that just wrapped up.
“You don’t get everything done in one year. I think the Senate president can back me up on that, and lots of people in the General Assembly,” Pritzker said Sunday at his end-of-session news conference in Springfield, flanked by Senate President Don Harmon of Oak Park. “Sometimes they spend two years, four years, six years trying to get something big done. I think

Turn to Yielded, Page 2

‘I’M REALLY NOT SAFE’

A Venezuelan poet’s fight to stay and write in the United States

By Nell Salzman | Chicago Tribune

When Oriette D’Angelo, in the fifth year of her doctorate program at the University of Iowa, found out that President Donald Trump had plans to revoke her temporary protected status, she told her friends she would mail them her notebooks of poems if she had to go back to Venezuela.
They asked her why.
“It would be almost impossible to start over,” she said. She’d put years into her degree in Spanish and Portuguese, only to have it threatened by Trump’s immigration agenda.
D’Angelo, 34, came to Chicago on a student visa over a decade ago, seeking professional opportunities and escape from a crumbling infrastructure and violence

Turn to Poet, Page 6

Oriette D’Angelo pets her cat, Rush, at their home in Iowa City, Iowa, on Feb. 27. Rush came to the U.S. with D’Angelo in 2015 after living with her in Venezuela. AUDREY RICHARDSON/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

CHICAGOLAND Milwaukee father remains detained

Outside immigration court in downtown Chicago on Wednesday morning, demonstrators demanded the release of an undocumented Mexican father from Milwaukee who was detained by immigration authorities after being falsely accused of sending death threats to President Donald Trump. Ramon Morales Reyes, 54, appeared virtually before a Chicago immigration judge Wednesday following his arrest on May 21. Morales Reyes’ family said it has faced public shaming and received multiple death threats on social media since the Trump administration publicly condemned him.

NATION & WORLD Immigration cases face obstruction

In case after case, the Trump administration has taken a similar approach to the numerous legal challenges that have emerged in recent weeks to President Donald Trump’s aggressive deportation plans. Over and over, officials have either violated orders or used an array of obfuscations and delays to prevent federal judges from deciding whether violations took place. And so far, no one in the White House or any federal agency has had to pay a price for this obstructionist behavior.

