Minogue's wealth puts him in exclusive club

GOP's choice for governor, with Mont. home valued at $31m, says he gets voters' pain

From 2,900 acres of private ski terrain to a manicured golf course, the wealthy members of the Yellowstone Club near Big Sky, Mont., get to enjoy amenities only available in a place Forbes dubbed the "World's Most Exclusive Club."

Mark Zuckerberg and Bill Gates reportedly own homes there. Former Patriots quarterback Tom Brady's real estate portfolio included a Yellowstone Club home, at least before his divorce from Gisele Bündchen. Patriots owner Robert Kraft has been cited as a member. Even Taylor Swift and Travis Kelce reportedly celebrated there after their nuptials.

Also a member and homeowner there? Michael Minogue, the state GOP-endorsed candidate running for Massachusetts governor. The Hamilton Republican has campaigned on a platform of understanding the financial pains of voters grappling with the state's dual housing and affordability crises.

Minogue's home has a market value of $31 million, according to Montana records, and provides another level of insight into the former medical device company executive's vast wealth and potential connections as he pumps millions of his own dollars into his gubernatorial bid.

The Globe confirmed Minogue's homeownership in the Yellowstone

Club through land records, with the contractor who built his six-bedroom, eight-bathroom house, and with one of Minogue's childhood friends who said he's repeatedly visited him at the private ski community in southern Montana.

Minogue had previously acknowledged that he owned a property in Big Sky, but had not disclosed the details, value, or location. A 238-page financial disclosure Minogue was required to file as part of his gubernatorial bid lists properties he owns in Mas-

Playing 911 call can be risky in courtroom

Difficult to forecast how its dramatic power will affect Clancy jurors

By Nick Stoico

Few moments in the early days of the murder trial of Lindsay Clancy have been as searing as the playing of her husband, Patrick Clancy's, 911 call after he discovered their three children had been killed.

The recording played in the courtroom Wednesday was devastating, the cries of an anguished father leaving several jurors shaken, some wiping away tears.

The depth of its emotional force, legal analysts say, could shape how jurors view the rest of the trial, vividly illustrating the horror of the killings. But it also risked drawing a backlash, however slight, against prosecutors for presenting such disturbing evidence.

"It is inconceivable that the prosecution would not play the 911 recording for the jury," Jack Lu, a retired Superior Court judge, said Thursday. "They were always going to play the 911 tape."

The playing of the call was such a potentially explosive move that days before the trial started, Judge William F. Sullivan ruled the news media and the public could not record or distribute the recording when it was played for the jury.

Citizen-led ballot question presses Israel

Pro-Palestinian group calls for Providence to divest; city leaders split on Mideast war

PROVIDENCE — In an effort to ratchet up pressure on Israel, a group of citizens has successfully put a question on Providence's election ballot in November asking voters to divest city assets from foreign countries that commit human rights violations as well as from any "complicit" companies.

The ballot question, submitted by a group called the Providence for Palestine Coalition, appears to be the first citizen-led measure to ever get on the ballot, according to city archivists.

The ballot question does not directly mention Israel, but rather asks voters whether Providence should divest its investments from "foreign countries conducting ethnic cleansing, apartheid, illegal military occupation, or genocide," according to a copy of the group's petition. For guidance, Providence could rely on United Nations resolutions or investigations, US court rulings, or the International Court of Justice to determine which countries would be subject to divestment.

Zack Kligler, an organizer with Providence for Palestine, said the group is not aware of any countries other than Israel that would currently qualify.

"We believe that the people of Providence want to see an end to

Some Steward creditors will get payback

Private equity firm Cerberus reaches deal; amount secret

By Yogev Toby

Cerberus Capital Management, the private equity firm that pulled $800 million out of the doomed Steward Health Care system, reached a financial settlement Thursday with the contractors, suppliers, and other creditors who went unpaid as the hospital chain collapsed.

However, while the settlement has been approved by a US Bankruptcy Court judge in Houston, it remains cloaked in secrecy. The total amount was redacted and recipients were not disclosed, but in his order on the settlement, Judge Christopher Lopez wrote that it provided creditors with "significant value."

The resolution would mean that one of the original architects of the deal that converted a number of Catholic hospitals in Massachusetts into a for-profit health care chain will provide some compensation for the damages wrought by its collapse.

Steward owned eight community hospitals in Massachusetts and 23 hospitals in other states,

Foreign grad students face another blow

Trump restrictions reduce their options

By Michaela Towfighi

Colleges are bracing for a further decline in international student enrollment, especially in graduate programs, after the Trump administration restricted the duration of student visas and flexibility of degree programs.

The move earlier this month scrapped a longstanding policy that tied visas to the length of a student's program, without time constraints. Under the change, which takes effect in September, students have an initial four-year window and will be required to apply for an extension beyond that.

New England schools like MIT, with competitive doctoral programs that draw large numbers of foreign students, will be especially affected, as most degrees take longer on average to complete.
