SpaceX Puts Its IPO in Motion

SEC filing starts move to raise tens of billions of dollars in blockbuster debut

By MICAH MAIDENBERG AND CORRIE DRIEBUSCH

SpaceX filed Wednesday for its long-anticipated initial public offering, disclosing fresh information on its business and ownership as investors prepare for what could be the largest IPO on record. The rocket maker run by Elon Musk is looking to raise $80 billion or more, which would easily make it the largest IPO in history, eclipsing the offering by Saudi Aramco that raised $26 billion when it went public in 2019. SpaceX revealed new details about its financials and how Musk will try to grow a sprawling enterprise dedicated to advancing cutting-edge technologies in space and back on Earth. The company disclosed the information in an investor prospectus posted to the Securities and Exchange Commission's website. Musk has touted out-of-this-world objectives for the company, from deploying a huge number of artificial-intelligence satellites in the future to colonizing Mars. Texas-based SpaceX has distinct businesses, ranging from rocket-launch and satellite operations to a nascent AI unit that is racing to catch up with rivals. Founded by Musk in 2002, SpaceX revolutionized the commercial space industry. The company has grown from a startup with a handful of employees that almost went out of business to one of the world's most valuable private companies with more than 22,000 workers as of March 31. It controls technologies that competitors—and even nation states—haven't been able to fully match. SpaceX reported its revenue last year at $18.67 billion, up 33% from the prior year. However, it swung to a net loss of $4.94 billion, driven by a sharp increase in costs including those for research and development. In 2024, the company said its profit was $791 million. SpaceX successfully developed a fleet of partially reusable Falcon 9 rockets that allowed it to dominate the global launch market. The company's Starlink satellite-internet business has grown quickly in recent years

est moves to punish GOP critics and reward allies headed into what is expected to be a difficult midterm election for their party. The growing frustration with Trump could endanger Republicans' legislative agenda, which relies primarily on their ability to stick together on party-line votes, from immigration-enforcement funding to a gas-tax holiday to tens of billions of dollars for the U.S. war in Iran. It could also weigh on their chances for holding on to the House and Senate. "I think it goes back to the old, 'Be careful what you wish for,'" quipped Sen. Thom Tillis (R., N.C.), who is retiring after Trump made clear he wanted him gone. On votes, he said, "I think there will be fewer political calculations going into people's decision-making process." The split centers on Trump's efforts to oust sitting Republican members of Congress, topped off by his endorsement of a challenger to

U.S. Charges Castro Over Downed Planes

MIAMI—The Trump administration has secured an indictment against Raúl Castro, Cuba's aging patriarch and former president, escalating its pressure campaign as it seeks to force economic and political concessions from the country's Communist regime.

By Sadie Gurman, Deborah Acosta and Vera Bergengruen

Prosecutors charged Castro with murder, conspiracy to kill U.S. nationals and destruction of aircraft, according to court documents, dealing a blow to a leader of the Cuban revolution who remains the country's most powerful figure despite his retirement from public life.

The charges relate to the Cuban military's shooting down of civilian planes flown by the humanitarian group Brothers to the Rescue in 1996, when Castro was serving as defense minister. Three U.S. citizens and one permanent resident—all part of the Cuban exile community—were killed. "The United States government has not forgotten these innocent men who were shot out of the sky," said Acting Attorney General Todd Blanche, who announced the indictment at Miami's Freedom Tower in front of members of the local Cuban-American community.

Hacky Sack Revival Baffles Gen X

Teens are taking the '90s trend to new heights

By KELLY CLOONAN

Alecia Whitaker Pace is experiencing déjà vu. First it was the overalls. Then New Kids On The Block. "Why is my childhood coming back?" the Long Island, N.Y., mom recently asked. "And now hacky sack?" The little bean bags that once appeared relegated to the same cultural graveyard as mixtapes and Blockbuster have taken over high-school sports fields, hallways and sometimes classrooms seemingly overnight. Gen X and millennials couldn't be more thrilled that

Toxic U.S. Divide Reaches Jury Rooms

Rigid viewpoints and political divisions make juror battles more common

By CORINNE RAMEY

The first sign of divisions came on Halloween. A Florida jury hearing an opioid-related case planned a group costume inspired by a pair of Dr. Seuss characters, Thing One and Thing Two. Juror No. 2, a graphic designer, made each panelist a "Thing" sign that matched that person's juror number, and the group agreed to wear black or red shirts. When Juror No. 5 showed up in a navy blazer, Laurey Trailer, who later became forewoman, got annoyed. The juror, Gerson Puig, begrudgingly put on his "Thing 5" sign—then took it off right after the picture. "I left it where it belonged, in the jury room," said Puig, 54 years old, a self-employed restaurant consultant. "I knew at that moment we would have a problem," said Trailer, 70, an inspector for the Federal Aviation Administration. Dissension in jury rooms is as old as the U.S. jury system. Trial lawyers and consultants who size up potential jurors, though, say the kinds of pitched battles that eventually erupted in that Florida jury room are becoming more common. They blame a post-pandemic erosion of trust in the justice system, more rigid viewpoints and starker political divides, which they say have made it harder for 12 strangers to even get along,
