

The Boston Globe

Serving our community since 1872

THURSDAY, JULY 23, 2026

A streak to remember

Red Sox tie franchise record with 15th straight win before going down

ABOVE: BARRY CHIN/GLOBE STAFF; BELOW: DANIELLE PARHIZKARAN/GLOBE STAFF

PETER ABRAHAM

Jaylen Brown was a member of the Celtics the last time the Red Sox lost a game. Taylor Swift was not yet married to Travis Kelce, and Graham Platner was still campaigning for the Senate in Maine.

The astonishing win streak reached 15 games Wednesday afternoon when the Sox beat the Orioles, 6-3, in the first game of a doubleheader at Fenway Park.

A team thought to be hopelessly out of contention in June tied the franchise record for consecutive victories, set in 1946 when Ted Williams returned to the lineup after missing three seasons because of World War II. It's the longest streak in the major leagues since the Cardinals ran off 17 in a row in 2021. The 1916 New York Giants hold the record of 26.

Wednesday afternoon was a celebration at Fenway Park but things didn't go so well in the nightcap, as Andruw Monasterio was gunned down trying to stretch a single into a double in a 5-1 loss. C1.

For Sox fans, it was reminiscent of 1988, when interim manager Joe Morgan took over at the All-Star break and led the team to 12 consecutive wins en route to the division title.

That the surge came to a shuddering halt with a 5-1 loss in the second game didn't detract from the achievement.

"I'm just excited we got another one today," said third baseman Caleb Durbin, who was 2 for 4 with two runs and two RBIs in the first game. "You keep stacking one win over another, and then you get close. Once you get within three or four [of the record] they start to feel like playoff games because you want to get there."

That this particular Red Sox ON BALL, Page C4

Clancy's lawyer seeks 'fair people'

Prospective jurors questioned on attitudes about mental health

By Shelley Murphy, Travis Andersen, and Sean Cotter
GLOBE STAFF

PLYMOUTH — Jurors who will decide the fate of Lindsay Clancy, the Duxbury mother accused of killing her three children, are undergoing a screening process that has been unusual, intense, and personal.

The questionnaire prospective jurors have to complete includes a flurry of questions aimed at weeding out those who could not fairly consider Clancy's insanity defense or can't be impartial because of strong opinions about mental health illnesses and treatment.

Clancy is charged with murdering 5-year-old Cora, 3-year-old Dawson, and 8-month-old Callan in January 2023. While she has admitted to strangling them, Clancy has pleaded not guilty to the criminal charges, saying she was in the throes of severe postpartum mental illness and heard a voice in her head telling her to kill the children and herself.

She also slashed her own neck and wrists and jumped from a second-story window in an unsuccessful suicide attempt. Paralyzed from the waist down, Clancy remains in custody at Tewksbury Hospital and is brought into the courtroom each day in a wheelchair.

The responses from the prospective jurors are CLANCY, Page A10

Smithsonian tries to resist as Trump raises pressure

By Julian E.J. Sorapuru
GLOBE STAFF

WASHINGTON — Even as President Trump's Great American State Fair dominated the National Mall amid the nation's 250th anniversary, the White House continued to train a probing eye on a nearby building that framed the extravaganza.

On July 4, the White House Domestic Policy Council released a 162-page report accusing the Smithsonian's National Museum of American History of focusing far too much on the country's shortcomings and not enough on its triumphs, using the American story "as a political instrument to divide, dispirit, and discourage our citizens."

In a sign of mounting political pressure on the museum, its director, Anthea Hartig, was called to testify before two House panels this week on back-to-back days. Hartig was grilled by Republican lawmakers over exhibitions they found objectionable on both Tuesday and Wednesday mornings, while they repeatedly questioned her love of country and political intentions.

Three recent exhibitions especially incensed SMITHSONIAN, Page A6

Commuters have to ride out latest shutdown

With Red Line closed, some trips measured in hours

By Spencer Buell
GLOBE STAFF

CAMBRIDGE — There are many miserable commutes into Boston. You might find yourself trapped on I-93, brake lights stretching to the horizon. Or plodding along on the Tobin, where the destination is so close, yet so far. Or creeping endlessly into bottlenecked tunnels on the Mass. Pike. Day after day.

But things could be worse. You could be relying on the Red Line, where for the next week and a half, a trip into Boston that once took less than 20 minutes can now take more than two hours.

"I think it's crazy," said construction worker Melvin Saunders, 67, as he boarded a shuttle bus toward Boston at Alewife station Tuesday morning. "I think all shutdowns are crazy."

From now through July 30, Red Line trains north of Park Street have screeched to a halt to make way for what the MBTA is calling "critical" infrastructure updates.

Tens of thousands of people ride the Red Line every day. And unless the portion of those riders with things to do from downtown to the tippy top of Cambridge have a better option, they'll have to spend their journey on shuttle buses. They would be wise to budget lots of extra time.

Some have made peace with the sacrifices required of commuters under MBTA general manager Phil Eng's strategy of fixing things on T lines in multiday flurries of work.

"I don't have another choice," said Mong Tsai, 55, who was en route to a government job in Downtown Crossing.

He wouldn't exactly say he's maintaining a positive attitude about the whole thing. "Neutral," Tsai said.

Despite a public awareness campaign about the shutdown, many were still caught off guard Tuesday RED LINE, Page A7

Cambridge residents find new housing comes with a price

Some worry about neighborhoods; others see a necessary evil

By Andrew Brinker
GLOBE STAFF

CAMBRIDGE — Depending who you ask, the project at 9 Wyman Road in Huron Village represents either the solution to Cambridge's stifling housing shortage, or a bellwether of upheaval to the city's most cherished neighborhoods.

The proposal would have a developer knock down a stately single-family house on a tree-lined cul-de-sac of big and expensive homes, and replace it with a 56-unit white and black apartment building, six stories tall and just feet from its shorter neighbors.

Those neighbors are not pleased. They've started a website to "Stop 9 Wyman" and have asked the historical commission to deem the home a landmark and halt its demolition, to no avail. There are whispers of a lawsuit.

"I think every person on this street would agree that cities like Cambridge grow and change and need to build more housing," said Daniel Cohn, who lives next door. "But it is difficult to see how a project this big can reasonably fit onto our little street."

To many, though, this is what it will take to solve a housing crisis that has made Cambridge one of the most expensive places in the world to live, one that has forced many longtime residents to move away.

Projects like 9 Wyman were the goal when the City Council last year near-unanimously passed one of the nation's most permissive housing laws, in one swoop undoing a thicket of rules that had long dictated what could be built where in this densely packed and desirable city HOUSING, Page A10

DAVID L. RYAN/GLOBE STAFF

ANDERSON PORTER DESIGN/DND HOMES/CITY OF CAMBRIDGE

A funeral home and two multifamily buildings at 122-132 Western Avenue are set to be knocked down.

They would be replaced by a six-story multifamily building with as many as 74 units.

The ex-headmaster of a private Pittsfield high school for girls was indicted for allegedly failing to protect students from a teacher they said raped them. B1.

The US military announced that it was conducting a 12th night of strikes against Iran as both sides increasingly targeted civilian infrastructure. A3.

Thousands of Boston Medical Center nurses and hospital staff picketed as they seek a new contract. D1.

A Florida pastor sued OpenAI, claiming its chatbot, ChatGPT, had offered him "extremely dangerous medical recommendations." A2.

A real winner

Thursday: Just perfect. High 75-80. Low 60-65.

Friday: And another one. High 75-80. Low 60-65.

High tide: 7:19 a.m., 7:34 p.m. Sunrise: 5:28 Sunset: 8:13

Weather and Comics, D5-6.

VOL. 310, NO. 23

*

Suggested retail price
$4.00

