Iran-Israel Conflict Puts Energy Sector, Economy, Markets in Peril

By Benoit Faucon
And Summer Said

Israel and Iran struck at each other's energy facilities over the weekend, a significant escalation that brings the conflict closer to an industry vital to the global economy and markets.

The attacks have been limited, but oil prices have risen on the risk of greater damage, and the fighting has affected tanker traffic and supply flows.

Iran's role as a major oil producer and its proximity to other key exporters and transit routes gives it leverage over global energy markets. On Saturday, Esmail Kowsari, a senior commander in the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps, warned that Iran is considering closing the Strait of Hormuz, through which a third of the world's oil flows.

"Our hands are wide open when it comes to punishing the enemy, and the military response was only part of our overall response," said Kowsari, who is a member of Parliament in addition to his military position. The IRGC on Sunday confirmed Israel killed its intelligence chief, Mohammad Kazemi.

Tehran has often made that threat in times of tension without acting on it. Shippers, however, worry vessels sailing through the strait face a high risk of collateral damage and misidentification by warring parties, maritime security consulting firm Vanguard Tech said in a note to clients.

U.S. crude-oil futures rose 7.3% to close at $73 a barrel Friday, the highest in four months. On Sunday night, U.S. crude was trading at $73.88 a barrel.

Tehran is also vulnerable on the energy front. Its output enemies and under pressure from Washington to stop the fighting.

Now, it is reshaping the Middle East on its own terms and forcing the Trump administration to play catch up as Israeli leaders ramp up attacks against Iran. The moves could upend global markets and remake geopolitics—and potentially draw the U.S. into a regional conflagration.

With a series of daring intelligence operations and fierce military campaigns, Israel has effectively disabled Iranian allies Hamas and Hezbollah, while also prompting the collapse of the Assad regime in Syria. It is now taking the fight directly to Tehran.

Israel used the cover of American diplomatic efforts to mount a surprise assault that goes far beyond targeting Iran's nuclear program, instead aiming to cripple the country's theocratic regime.

The fight has also shoved American policy off the path

President Trump laid out earlier this year. After long pushing for a peaceful, diplomatic solution to keep Iran from developing nuclear weapons, he praised Israel's airstrikes and warned on social media, "Iran

Scrapbooking, knitting circles find younger fans

By Ann-Marie Alcántara

Young Americans are skipping middle age entirely.

Twenty- and 30-somethings are exchanging their doomscrolling for needlepoint, journaling and other hobbies that require more than just thumbs or a thumbs-up.

Dubbed "granny core" or "grandma hobbies," these pre-tech pastimes are surging, creating jarring scenes of young adults in knitting circles and bonding over sweaters and

Mall King Keeps Reins As He Battles Cancer

By Kate King
And Suzanne Kapner

David Simon had to step in to rescue the family business at age 29. Now, more than three decades later, America's last mall king is thinking about whether his own son will be ready to take the helm.

The chief executive of Simon Property Group is battling a deadly cancer but isn't ready to step aside. Even as he scales back his working hours to deal with his health, the notorious micromanager has never been good about giving up control.

"I've been kind of, you know, a domineering-type CEO," Simon said recently in a rare interview at his New York office. "Obviously, right now, that's impossible for me to do. I still do it occasionally."

Simon, 63, underwent a dozen cycles of chemotherapy and two surgeries since he was diagnosed with pancreatic cancer last year. He is still receiving treatment.

A ruthless competitor, he once launched an unsolicited takeover bid for rival mall operator Taubman—while its chairman was in prison. Simon's bid failed, but he acquired the company in a $3.4 billion deal nearly two decades later.

What does he enjoy most about his work? "Winning," Simon said, without hesitation.

He is prone to yelling, and to working around the clock. He won't think twice about calling subordinates on Saturday nights or Sunday mornings, former employees say.

Suspect Caught in Minnesota Politician Shootings

Manhunt ends after attacks that left a leading Democrat and her spouse dead

BROOKLYN PARK, Minn.—A man suspected of fatally shooting one Democratic state lawmaker and wounding another was arrested late Sunday after authorities tracked him into the woods in rural Minnesota, law-enforcement officials said.

The capture of 57-year-old Vance Luther Boelter ended a two-day manhunt that left the community on edge and rattled members of Congress in Washington. He had been wanted in the killings of state Rep. Melissa Hortman, a former speaker of the Minnesota House, and her husband and the shootings of state Sen. John Hoffman and his wife.

The four victims were shot early Saturday in what Minnesota Gov. Tim Walz, a Democrat, called an act of "targeted political violence."

Home Sellers Exceed Buyers by Plenty

By Nicole Friedman

The inventory of homes for sale is finally rising. Buyers aren't interested.

The U.S. housing market had nearly a half million more sellers than buyers in April, the biggest such gap on record in seasonally adjusted data going back to 2013, according to an analysis by real-estate brokerage Redfin.

After years of frustration with fast-rising prices and bidding wars, buyers now have the upper hand in many parts of the country. More sellers are cutting prices or offering concessions such as paying for buyers' closing costs.

A historic shortage of homes for sale is a big reason why the housing market has been stuck near its slowest sales pace in three decades. Buyers were frustrated with a lack of options, and desirable homes often sparked bidding wars.

Now, supply is rising because some sellers have experienced life events that require they move, such as a job relocation or having a baby. Others are unloading investment properties because their costs are rising, or they are worried that home prices will fall and want to sell before that happens, real-estate agents say.
