In a World Series win for the ages, Dodgers secure dynasty status

By JACK HARRIS

TORONTO — The Dodgers’ march toward destiny was completed a quarter past midnight on Saturday evening.

It was unbelievable, indescribable, long-dreamt-of — and yet, the way the night was once headed, entirely unexpected at the same time.

In Game 7 of the World Series, the Dodgers cemented a dynasty with one of the greatest games this sport has ever seen.

They beat the Toronto Blue Jays 5-4 in 11 innings, riding one season-saving play after another to improbably repeat as champions of baseball.

There was a miraculous ninth-inning comeback, when Miguel Rojas tied it with a home run to left field. There was a frantic escape from a bases-loaded jam the next half-inning — the Dodgers staring down certain defeat, only to once again prevail.

After a challenging year, city embraces cause for celebration

By TERRY CASTLEMAN, RUBEN VIVES AND BILL SHAIKIN

You didn’t have to be watching the seventh game of the World Series to know that the Dodgers clinched back-to-back wins.

This is Los Angeles, after all.

So sounds of fireworks exploding seemingly in every direction gave it away. The team couldn’t see the light show from Toronto, but they were hard to miss across the L.A. Basin.

And soon, the streets of downtown Los Angeles, Echo Park, East L.A. and elsewhere were crowded with fans celebrating.

“It’s crazy out here, back to back,” said Dodgers fan Steven Gomez of L.A. as he watched a firework explode overhead in Echo Park. “L.A. never gives up, man. Like Kobe said, the job isn’t finished.”

Gomez emphasized that nobody throws a celebration quite like his hometown. “This is L.A. We love all coming out together as a community,” [See Celebration, A6]

A stark divide in Prop. 50 rhetoric

Both sides say they’re defending democracy. But for the ‘no’ camp, messaging is harder.

By SEEMA MEHTA

If the ads are any indication, Proposition 50 offers Californians a stark choice: “Stick it to Trump” or “throw away the Constitution” in a Democratic power grab.

And like so many things in 2025, Trump appears to be the galvanizing issue.

Even amid the incendiary campaigns California is used to, Proposition 50 has been notable for its sharp attacks to cut through the dense, esoteric issue of congressional redistricting. It comes down to a basic fact: This is a Democratic-led measure to reconfigure California’s congressional districts to help the party win control of the U.S. House of Representatives in 2026 and stifle President Trump’s attempts to keep Republicans in power through similar means in other states.

Thus far, the anti-Trump message preached by Proposition 50 advocates, led by Gov. Gavin Newsom and other top Democrats, appears to be the most effective.

Supporters of the proposal have vastly outraised their rivals, and Proposition 50, one of the most expensive ballot measure campaigns in state history, leads in the polls.

“Whenever you can take an issue and personalize it, you have the advantage. In this case, proponents of 50 can make it all about stopping Donald Trump,” said former legislative leader and state GOP Chair Jim Brulte.

Adding to the drama is the role of two political and cultural icons who have emerged as leaders of each side: former President Obama in favor and former Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger against, both arguing that the very essence of democracy is at stake.

USDA rules can’t control widespread salmonella in poultry

By SUSANNE RUST

A new report based on government inspection documents shows salmonella is widespread in U.S. grocery store chicken and turkey products. But because of how the pathogen is classified, the federal government has no authority to do much about it.

Farm Forward, an organization that advocates for farmworker rights and humane farm practices, released a report last week that examined five years of monthly U.S. Department of Agriculture inspections at major U.S. poultry plants. It found that at many plants, including those that process and sell poultry under brand names such as Foster Farms, Costco and Perdue, levels of salmonella routinely exceeded maximum standards set by the federal government.

“The USDA is knowingly allowing millions of packages of chicken contaminated with salmonella to be sold in stores from major brands,” said Andrew de-Coriolis, the organization’s executive director.

Some 1.3 million Americans are sickened each year by eating salmonella-contaminated food, according to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Most people have only mild symptoms, but others suffer diarrhea, nausea and vomiting. Roughly 19,000 [See Salmonella, A8]

Woman deported straight into arms of violent husband

By RACHEL URANGA

Carmen’s abusive husband came home drunk one night last summer. He pounded and kicked the door. He threatened to kill her as her young son watched in horror. She called police, eventually obtaining a restraining order. Months later he returned and beat her again. Police came again and he was eventually deported.

Thinking she had finally escaped his cruelty, Carmen applied for what is known as a U-Visa. The visa provides crime victims a way to stay in the United States legally, but the Trump administration has routinely ignored pending applications.

During a regular immigration check-in in June, Carmen was detained. Two months later, she was put on a plane with her 8-year-old son, who just completed second grade. She was headed to her home country, terrified her husband would find her.
