Tourism hopes swamped in Vermont

On Lake Champlain, businesses fear losses amid White House conflict with Canada

By Paul Heintz
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

BURLINGTON, Vt. — Todd Smith stepped across a missing plank on a dock jutting out into Lake Champlain as workers reconnected water lines to Burlington Harbor Marina's 160 boat slips. A brisk south wind whipped through American, Canadian, and Vermont flags as Smith, who works at the marina, gestured toward a concrete fuel dock. "On a nice summer day, this is where all the action is," he said.

Smith hopes that'll be the case when the brief but busy boating season in Vermont's largest city begins next month, but he worries that tensions between the United States and its northern neighbor could prompt Canadian boaters to navigate elsewhere.

"That would be detrimental to not just us but the whole waterfront region — the shops, the restaurants — which is a shame," he said. "They are key to our summer tourism here."

Canadians represent about 5 percent of Vermont's visitors, and close to 30 percent in northern parts, making them a key part of the state's $4 billion tourism economy, according to Heather Pelham, commissioner of the Vermont Department of Tourism and Marketing. But since President Trump took office this year with threats to make Canada "the 51st state" — and imposed tough tariffs and new border security measures — Canadian tourism to the US has plummeted.

According to the Canadian govern-

Trump dodges on due process

Says, 'I don't know,' when asked if all in US have that constitutional right

By Jonathan Swan
NEW YORK TIMES

President Trump said in an interview that aired Sunday that he did not know whether every person on American soil was entitled to due process, despite constitutional guarantees, and complained that adhering to that principle would result in an unmanageable slowdown of his mass deportation program.

The revealing exchange, on NBC's "Meet the Press," was prompted by interviewer Kristen Welker asking Trump if he agreed with Secretary of State Marco Rubio that citizens and noncitizens in the United States were entitled to due process.

"I don't know," Trump replied. "I'm not, I'm not a lawyer. I don't know."

Welker reminded the president that the Fifth Amendment says as much.

"I don't know," Trump said again. "It seems — it might say that, but if you're talking about that, then we'd have to have a million or 2 million or 3 million trials." Left unmentioned was how anyone could be sure these people were immigrants without legal permission, let alone criminals, without hearings.

Trump responded "I don't know" one more time and referred to his "brilliant lawyers" when Welker asked whether, as president, he needed to "uphold the Constitution of the United States."

Manufacturers wary on tariffs

Mass. companies sent nearly $4b worth of products to China last year

FALL RIVER — On a factory floor in this city's downtown, workers at Merrow Manufacturing are stitching sweaters, beanies, and blankets destined for distribution across the United States and Europe. The plan was to expand sales to China, but now that's off the table.

Same complication on another floor in the building where Merrow makes sewing machines, some of which are exported to China and many other countries. The chief executive of the nearly two-century-old manufacturer, Charlie Merrow, said half its business is exports, with about 10 percent going to China, but that market is now paralyzed after Beijing slapped retaliatory tariffs on American imports.

"All open purchase orders are frozen," Merrow said. "The machines that we build already are expensive and we can't export them. Period."

He said Merrow machines average about $4,700 retail, so tariffs from China would substantially increase their costs.

"We are not reducing our prices to offset tariff increases," he said.

His company is among those Massachusetts manufacturers caught in the middle of a tit-for-tat tariff battle between the world's two largest economies.

ICE actions at courts decried as threatening

Lawyers, advocates warn of a chilling effect on justice

One was arrested by immigration agents in the middle of his criminal trial in Boston. Another tackled by agents at a courthouse in New Hampshire, a third taken from his lawyer's car and arrested outside the courthouse in New Britain, Conn.

They are recent examples of what lawyers and advocates say are bold intrusions on the local justice system by US Immigration and Customs Enforcement that are making immigrants so fearful they are now reluctant to appear in court as victims, witnesses or defendants.

"This creates tremendous fear for people in immigrant communities, and not just those who are undocumented," said Amy Grunder, director of state government affairs for the MIRA Coalition, a Boston-based immigrant and refugee advocacy group.

That's because many immigrant families have some members here legally and others here with-

Lawmakers oppose lottery for vocational high school admission

By Christopher Huffaker

The Massachusetts Legislature is considering blocking a proposed change to lottery admissions for the state's popular trade high schools, even as other power brokers in the state have lined up on the other side.

State education leaders had taken steps to move to lottery-based admissions following criticism by advocates who argue the existing admissions process locks many marginalized students out. But after lobbying efforts from some of the vocational schools themselves, Massachusetts House lawmakers have now taken action to prohibit the Department of Elementary and Secondary Education from making any admissions changes before the 2027-28 school year and instead to create a new task force to further study the issue.

The measures were part of the budget passed by the House last week. The House budget and the governor's proposal now
