Trump Weighs A Wider Strike If Iran Resists

This article is by Julian E. Barnes, David E. Sanger, Tyler Pager and Eric Schmitt.

WASHINGTON — President Trump has told advisers that if diplomacy or any initial targeted U.S. attack does not lead Iran to give in to his demands that it give up its nuclear program, he will consider a much bigger attack in coming months intended to drive that country’s leaders from power, people briefed on internal administration deliberations said.

Negotiators from the United States and Iran are scheduled to meet in Geneva on Thursday for what appears to be last-ditch negotiations to avoid a military conflict. But Mr. Trump has been weighing options for U.S. action if the negotiations fail.

Though no final decisions have been made, advisers said, Mr. Trump has been leaning toward an initial strike in coming days intended to demonstrate to Iran’s leaders that they must be willing to agree to give up the ability to make a nuclear weapon.

Targets under consideration range from the headquarters of Iran’s Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps to the country’s nuclear sites to the ballistic missile program.

Should those steps fail to persuade Tehran to meet his demands, Mr. Trump told advisers, he would leave open the possibility of a military assault later this year intended to help topple Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the supreme leader.

There are doubts even inside the administration about whether that goal can be accomplished with airstrikes alone. And behind the scenes, a new proposal is being considered by both sides that could create an off-ramp to military conflict: a very limited nuclear enrichment program that Iran could carry out solely for purposes of medical research and treatments.

It is unclear whether either side would agree. But the last-minute proposal comes as two aircraft carrier groups and dozens of fighter jets, bombers and refuelers are headed to the Persian Gulf.

After Two-Week High, Olympians Dread a Thud

By ANDREW KEH
MILAN — One moment, you’re living out your childhood dreams, performing for thousands of spectators, flirting with national hero status, hobnobbing with the world’s best athletes, eating endless free food, taking questions from journalists fixated on your every move.

The next moment, you’re not. This, in a nutshell, is the whiplash of the average Olympian. It is the head trip that athletes navigate in the aftermath of any Winter or Summer Games and the reason so many have begun strategizing for the emotional roller coaster awaiting them when the quadrennial spotlight fades. “You work for years for something, and then it just goes by so quick,” said Emery Lehman, an American speedskater who competed at his fourth Olympics at the Milan-Cortina Games, which ended on Sunday. “You go home, and it’s back to the real world.”

Athletes call it the post-Olympic blues or the Olympic comedown. It is widespread but its form varies, from minor rushes of anxiety to debilitating depression.

“We’ve been calling it the ‘post-Games feels,’” said Jess Bartley, the senior director of psychological services for the United States Olympic and Paralympic Committee. “I don’t know if we can fix it or change it. It’s all about helping athletes better understand it.”

Olympians generally have become more outspoken about the mental side of competition and the struggles they face away from the public eye.

The American swimmer Michael Phelps, who won a record 28 Olympic medals, helped set the conversation in motion in recent years by talking about the intense depression he faced at the conclusion of his career.

Andrew Slides From British Queen’s Indulged Son to King’s Disgraced Brother

By SARAH LYALL
In March 2022, the man still known as Prince Andrew was in disgrace, his reputation shredded by increasingly lurid revelations about his ties to the sex offender Jeffrey Epstein. Stripped of his royal duties and military titles, he had just paid a multimillion-dollar settlement to Virginia Giuffre, a victim of Mr. Epstein’s trafficking network who said Andrew had sexually assaulted her when she was a teenager. Nevertheless, Andrew was front and center at the memorial service for his father, Prince Philip. He accompanied his 95-year-old mother, Queen Elizabeth II, from Windsor, then escorted her into Westminster Abbey. If the queen indulged and protected Andrew all his life, he would get no such treatment from

King Charles III, who has responded to each new unsavory turn in his brother’s scandal by taking away more of the trappings of his royal life — money, status and titles. Though Andrew took his place with the royal family at Elizabeth’s funeral later that year, Charles forbade him to wear his military uniform. Andrew attended his brother’s coronation but was assigned an ignominious seat in the third row of the Abbey. Last fall, Charles stripped him of the last vestiges of his royal identity — no more Prince Andrew, no more Duke of York — decreeing that he simply be called Andrew Mountbatten-Windsor. And on Thursday, when the former prince was arrested on suspicion of “misconduct in public office,” Charles released an unusual statement that had, by Windsor standards, the sharpness and sav-agery of a guillotine. Most royal statements are written in an anonymous third-person voice, conveying the thoughts of His or Her Majesty. But this one began with “I,” offering the unfiltered, if formal, words of an angry king. “I have learned with the deepest concern the news about Andrew Mountbatten-Windsor,” Charles wrote, adding that the authorities would have “four full and
