MATILDE, 54, was detained by federal agents in a raid in Pacoima. She later was hospitalized for five days.

Outrage and criticism over immigration sweeps

The woman was splayed on the sidewalk with her shirt half-raised, unconscious. Nearby, federal immigration agents stood guard as people screamed at them.

Arturo Hermosillo, a U.S. citizen, was in his work van, recording it all when an agent ordered him to back up to make room for an ambulance that was en route for the woman.

As he was reversing, he said, another agent started banging on his window and side view mirror, pushing it in. He couldn't see behind him and felt a bump.

Hermosillo opened his door to tell the agents he couldn't move. But not long after, they dragged him out of his van.

A raid during which a vendor suffered a heart attack reflects the chaotic methods being employed

"I told them I didn't do anything illegal," he said.

Hermosillo was arrested and sent to the Metropolitan Detention Center in downtown L.A. The woman, who later said she had fainted while an agent bear-hugged her to the point that she struggled to breathe, underwent heart surgery at a Providence Holy Cross Medical Center. A doctor told her she had suffered a heart attack.

The immigration sweep on June 19, just outside a Lowe's Home Improvement store, is one of many that have taken place in Southern California and encapsulates the chaotic methods employed to detain people over the last month. A federal judge on Friday ruled

Administration vows to ramp up ICE operations

But a Gallup survey shows public support has slipped for strict immigration measures.

By Hannah Fry, Brittny Mejia and Rachel Uranga

The Trump administration immigration sweeps that have roiled Southern California have shown few signs of slowing despite lawsuits, a court order and growing indications the aggressive actions are not popular with the public.

The operations, which began in early June in the Los Angeles area, largely focused on small-scale targets such as car washes, strip malls and Home Depot parking lots before authorities hit their biggest target last week — two farms for one of the largest cannabis companies in California. One worker died after falling from a greenhouse roof during the raid, while 361 others were arrested.

Responding to the death, President Trump's chief border policy advisor, Tom Homan, called the situation "sad."

"It's obviously unfortunate when there's deaths," he told CNN. "No one wants to see people die."

"He wasn't in ICE custody," Homan said. "ICE did not have hands on this person."

Homeland Security Secretary Kristi Noem said authorities plan to intensify immigration crackdowns thanks to more funding from the recently passed One Big Beautiful Bill Act spending plan from Congress.

The budget legislation infuses roughly $150 billion into Trump's immigration and border enforcement plans, including funding for Immigration and Customs Enforcement and Border Patrol staffing, immigrant detention facility construction and operations, and reimbursement to states and local governments for immi-

L.A. County sees 4% drop in homelessness

By Andrew Khouri and Noah Goldberg

The number of homeless people across L.A. County declined 4% in 2025, marking the second consecutive drop after years of steady increases, with a 10% decrease in people living in the streets, according to the annual count released Monday.

The decline, based on a snapshot taken in February, comes after billions in taxpayer funds spent to solve homelessness in the county, and with increasing scrutiny over how the money is being spent.

Officials with the Los Angeles Homeless Services Authority, which conducts the count, said the declines show the investment is

YouTube creators chase after Emmy nods

By Kaitlyn Huamani

Michelle Khare has mastered taekwondo, muscled through police academy and conquered Houdini's deadliest trick. But now comes a different kind of challenge for the popular daredevil: proving to the Hollywood establishment that Emmyworthy content arises from YouTube.

The host, known for her online reality series "Challenge Accepted," is part of a group of YouTube creators with massive followings, producing high-caliber content, who are vying for Primetime Emmy Awards this year.

Although she won't need to enlist the help of an Olympian or train for months this time around, she's taking the challenge head-on. But while she's been on the awards campaign, Khare said her top priority is letting her videos speak for themselves.

To that end, she's taken on some high-profile challenges lately, including surprising Tom Cruise at the premiere of "Mission: Impossible — The Final Reckoning." She got in by donning a mask ala the spy franchise, whipping it off for the big reveal. And she teased the process of training to take on Cruise's infamous stunt of hanging off a plane as it's taking off.

When a life coach manifests nothing but debt and delusion

By Juno Kelly

When Anela Pasalic moved from her rural hometown in Småland, Sweden, to study in the capital of Stockholm, she remembers feeling isolated and severely depressed. It was then that she happened across a glamorous spiritual guru.

Pasalic watched on her phone screen as Kathrin Zenkina shared, from roughly 5,500 miles away in Los Angeles, how she turned her life around through manifestation, which is the philosophy that we can will things into existence by believing they'll happen.

"It just felt like she was an ordinary girl who went for it and had amazing shifts in her life. She also seemed very kind, caring and understanding," Pasalic says.

For Pasalic, Zenkina felt like an online best friend — one who boasts almost 450,000 followers on Instagram, identifies herself as a "seven-figure entrepreneur" and sells manifestation courses through her business, the Manifestation Babe Academy.

Pasalic, who first encountered Zenkina in 2018 when she was 23, took out a payment plan to cover a $1,300 program that Zenkina advertised as the only course one would need to manifest their dreams.

Now 30, Pasalic estimates she has spent more than $6,000 on Manifestation Babe Academy courses. To Russia risks tariffs, fed-up Trump says

By Chris Megerian and Illia Novikov

WASHINGTON — President Trump on Monday threatened Russia with steep tariffs and announced a rejuvenated pipeline for American weapons to reach Ukraine, hardening his stance toward Moscow after months of frustration about unsuccessful negotiations for ending the war.

The latest steps reflect an evolving approach from the Republican president, who promised to swiftly resolve the war started by Russian President Vladimir Putin when he invaded Ukraine three years ago. Trump once focused his criticism on Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelensky, whom he described as unwilling to compromise, but more recently has expressed growing irritation toward Putin.

"My conversations with him are very pleasant, and then the missiles go off at night," Trump said. He complained that "it just keeps going on and on and on."

Trump said he would implement "severe tariffs" unless a peace deal is reached within 50 days. He provided few details on how they would be implemented, but he described them as secondary tariffs, meaning they would target Russia's trading partners in an effort to isolate Moscow in the global economy.

In addition, Trump said European allies would buy "billions and billions" of dollars of U.S. military equipment to be transferred to Ukraine, replenishing the besieged country's weapons supplies. He made the announcement in the Oval Office alongside North Atlantic Treaty Organization Secretary-General Mark Rutte.
