

Trump ratchets up his rhetoric

After D.C. shooting, he vows extreme steps against immigration

By Shawn McCreesh
NEW YORK TIMES

The shooting of two National Guard members by a gunman identified by authorities as an Afghan national has set off an especially intense level of fury in President Trump and a new push to step up his anti-immigration policies.

In a series of statements in the two days since the shooting on a Washington street corner just blocks from the White House, Trump has cast the attack as exactly what he has warned about and made clear that he intends to use it to pursue an even more maximalist version of his agenda.

In social media posts near midnight on Thanksgiving, he vowed to “permanently pause migration from all Third World Countries” and threatened to strip US citizenship from naturalized migrants “who undermine domestic tranquility.”

He threatened to “end all Federal benefits and subsidies to noncitizens of our Country” and deport foreigners deemed to be “non-compatible with Western Civilization.”

The State Department announced Friday

TRUMP, Page A6

Skiers, resorts take advantage of a cold fall

Many mountains open earlier than usual

By Sabrina Shankman
GLOBE STAFF

There’s dedication, and then there’s 12-year-old Ben Milligan.

At 5:55 a.m., his helmet and snow pants fresh out of winter storage, Milligan trudged out of the lodge at Wachusett Mountain and got in the lift line. Never mind that he was all alone and that lift wouldn’t start running until 8.

Milligan was dead set on getting this season’s first chair last Saturday — a full week ahead of Wachusett’s previously planned opening day.

“It’s kind of an honor,” said the seventh-grader, who — in textbook skiing form — ended up befriending a kid on the lift and making a ski buddy for the day.

Skiers get it.

Across New England, ski mountains and their dedicated fans received a nice surprise this November: early openings and with plenty of snow.

“Some ski resorts across Vermont and New Hampshire haven’t seen November snow like

SKIING, Page A7

POCKET-SIZE PLACE OF PEACE

PHOTOS BY LANE TURNER/GLOBE STAFF

Hall’s Pond in Brookline provides a sense of calm for photographer Lane Turner, who spent a year recording his gratitude for the oasis. From top: A heron clutched a fish in June. Pond lilies broke up the reflection of late afternoon sunlight on the trees around the pond in September. An ant crawled up a bugleweed flower in May. B2.

To some, it’s bias; to others, a tribute

Move to change Salem city seal roils residents

By Brian MacQuarrie
GLOBE STAFF

City documents in historic Salem are stamped with an artistic vestige of its rich maritime past — a seal showing palm trees, a sailing ship, and a dove holding an olive branch. At its center stands a rendering of a finely dressed, 19th-century merchant from the Indonesian island of Sumatra.

Adopted nearly two centuries ago, the emblem reflects the robust, transoceanic connections forged in a lucrative pepper trade that had helped make Salem the wealthiest community per-capita in the young United States.

Now, a recommendation by a city-appointed task force to abandon the seal has spawned a tempest.

To one side, the seal contains an anachronistic, racial caricature of a 19th-century Asian merchant. To the other side, it honors a progressive, cross-cultural commerce that benefited peoples a world apart.

“I don’t think at this point in history we should be using any person on a seal. It raises a lot of issues,” said Rachel TonThat, the task force’s vice chair. “Is this one individual representing an

SEAL, Page A10

CITY OF SALEM

Salem’s seal includes an image of a 19th-century Sumatran merchant.

President Volodymyr Zelenskyy’s powerful chief of staff resigned in the highest-level political realignment in Ukraine since Russia’s all-out invasion nearly four years ago. A3.

The Individuals with Disabilities Education Act sends billions of dollars a year to states to fund special ed services, but its future is uncertain. B1.

The Boston Herald is among nine regional newspapers suing OpenAI and Microsoft, accusing the companies of violating copyright law. D1.

‘It’s actually shaping up better than what I had anticipated.’

JEFF TAYLOR, Windswept Mountain View Christmas Tree Farm

Christmas tree farms ready with seasonal best

Growers say summer’s drought wasn’t as damaging as they had feared

JESSICA RINALDI/GLOBE STAFF

Jeff Taylor amid the trees at Windswept Mountain View Christmas Tree Farm in Richmond, N.H.

By Amanda Gokee
GLOBE STAFF

Jeff Taylor’s 14-acre hillside in Richmond, N.H., is blanketed in Christmas trees. During the holiday season, Taylor said, he typically sells out in a matter of days.

This year, Taylor has been tending to the trees with some concern. Drought conditions have parched the region, leaving long dry spells with no rain.

But despite the difficult weather, Taylor said this year’s crop is ready to shine, with lights, ornaments, and garlands.

“It’s actually shaping up better than what I had anticipated,” he said. “In spite of the drought, I had some pretty good growth, as much as a foot and a half, 2 feet on some of the trees.”

With many families across New England preparing to deck the halls and trim their holiday trees with tradition and good cheer, Christmas tree farmers in New Hampshire are ready for a busy season. While drought can stunt the growth of young trees, farmers and foresters said consumers can still expect a quality crop.

“Trees are resilient,” Taylor said.

This year, they had to endure conditions that could’ve been concocted by the Grinch. New Hampshire saw its driest summer on record in 130 years, which decimated some crops, sparked more wildfires, and ran some private wells dry. And those concerns extended throughout New England, with long-term predictions saying the drought would persist into 2026. Since July, rainfall has been below normal, with some weather stations logging a deficit of about 6 inches in recent days.

Trees are often priced based on their size and height, ranging from $50 for a small tree

TREES, Page A10

Rays to go

Saturday: Sunny, windy. High: 41-46. Low: 29-34.

Sunday: Cloudy, rainy. High: 47-52. Low: 36-41.

Sunrise: 6:52 Sunset: 4:13

Comics and Weather, D4-5.

Obituaries, C9.

VOL. 308, NO. 152

Suggested retail price
$4.00

