Trump Intensifies Crackdown On Immigration After Shooting

By Louise Radnofsky And Michelle Hackman

President Trump is pushing for an intensified "reverse migration" agenda across his administration, seeking to broaden a crackdown on millions of immigrants from poorer countries following the killing of a 20-year-old member of the West Virginia National Guard.

Trump and top aides have made clear in recent days they are seeking to remove many legal immigrants who were born in countries the White House deems "high risk," in addition to those who are in the country illegally.

"Even as we have progressed technologically, Immigration Policy has eroded those gains and living conditions for many. I will permanently pause migration from all Third World Countries to allow the U.S. system to fully recover," Trump wrote on social media, hours after he had announced the death Thursday of U.S. Army Spc. Sarah Beckstrom in a Thanksgiving call to members of the military.

Zelensky's Top Aide Resigns Amid Probe

President Volodymyr Zelensky's right-hand man and top peace negotiator has resigned, as an investigation into alleged corruption in the country's government widens.

*By Ian Lovett, Robbie Gramer and Laurence Norman

The departure of Andriy Yermak marks the biggest shakeup of Ukraine's government since the start of the war and deprives Zelensky of a trusted emissary at a pivotal moment, with Russia advancing on the battlefield and the U.S. pressuring Kyiv to make painful concessions to end the conflict.

Calls for Yermak's ouster had been growing for weeks, following allegations of a $100 million corruption scheme at the state nuclear energy company. Two cabinet ministers had already been dismissed, and on Friday morning, anticorruption investigators searched Yermak's home.

Anticorruption authorities have been investigating allegations that Ukrainian officials pressured companies to pay kickbacks for contracts with the state nuclear-energy company, Energoatom. Neither Yermak nor Zelensky has been accused of wrongdoing. Their

Mistrust Shadows Air India Inquiry

Tension between U.S., Indian experts has dogged crash investigation

By Andrew Tangel

When two American black-box specialists landed in New Delhi in late June, urgent messages arrived on their phones.

Don't go with the Indians, their colleagues told them.

Earlier that day, Indian authorities had told their American counterparts of a new plan to unlock the mysteries behind the first deadly crash involving a Boeing 787 Dreamliner.

They wanted the U.S. technical experts to take a late-night flight on a military plane and then drive to a remote area. At an aerospace company's lab there, the experts were supposed to analyze flight-data and cockpit voice recorders pulled from the wreckage of the Air India jet that crashed nearly two weeks prior, killing all but one of the 242 on board.

But that plan for the recorders—commonly called the black boxes—worried Jennifer

S&P 500 And Dow Eke Out Monthly Gains

Rally helps indexes recover lost ground, though Nasdaq ends November lower

By Vicky Ge Huang And Angus Berwick

A late November rally propelled stocks near record highs, with investor optimism over a potential Federal Reserve interest-rate cut in December helping reverse the effects of an earlier midmonth market slump.

The S&P 500 rose 0.5% on Friday, in an abbreviated post-holiday trading session, pushing it near a record set in late October and helping the index eke out a 0.1% monthly gain. The Dow Jones Industrial Average advanced 0.6% on the day, finishing the month with a 0.3% gain.

The tech-heavy Nasdaq, however, registered its first monthly loss since March, down 1.5% after a choppy period spurred by fears of an artificial-intelligence bubble. The index added about 0.7% Friday.

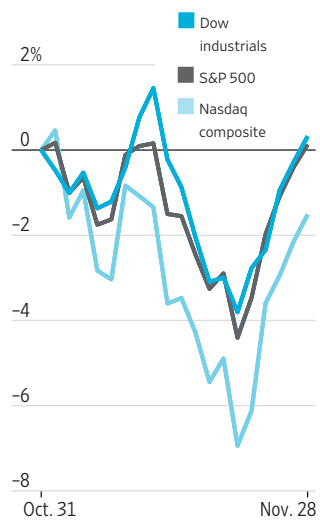

Stocks across the board gained in Friday's shortened session despite a CME Group outage that disrupted futures trading overnight.

The Nasdaq-led gains were bolstered by chip stocks including Intel, Analog Devices and Micron Technology, and so-called Magnificent Seven stocks like Amazon.com and Meta Platforms. Nvidia defied the trend, dropping 1.8% and capping a rocky month for the stock.

Rising food prices prompt kitchen alchemy: 'fridge foraging' and collecting bones

By Jesse Newman And Dean Seal

Bone bags. Pizza eggs. Fridge foraging. Welcome to the Leftover Olympics.

For years, uneaten hot dogs and half-empty cans of tomato paste languishing in the fridge have charted a quick path to the trash in American kitchens. Now, thanks to inflation and stubbornly high grocery bills, they're more often getting promoted—sometimes to the main course.

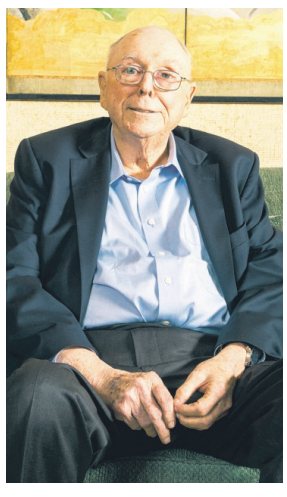

Getting scrappy

Take Kelly Bair's "bone bags." The Chicago-based architecture professor stashes vegetable scraps and leftover meat bones in plastic bags in her freezer. Once filled, the contents go into an Instapot with water and apple-cider vinegar, brewing broth that Bair uses in soups, rice and quinoa.

Restaurants have become a source, too, after bones from a

Defense-Tech Startup Hits Weapon Setbacks

The Navy was attempting to launch and recover more than 30 drone boats from a combat ship off the coast of California in May when more than a dozen of the uncrewed vessels failed to carry out their missions. The boats had rejected their inputs and automatically idled as a fail-safe, making them "dead" in the water.

The botched experiment quickly became a potential hazard to other vessels in the exercise. Military personnel scrambled overnight to clean up the mess, towing the boats to shore until 9 a.m. the next day.

The drone boats were relying on autonomy software called Lattice, made by California-based Anduril Industries. The Navy said the exercise was handled safely, but the incident alarmed Navy personnel, who said in a follow-up report that company representatives had misguided the military. In comments that were unusual for such a report, which was viewed by The Wall Street Journal, four sailors warned of "continuous operational security violations, safety violations, and contracting performer misguidances (Anduril Industries)." If the software configuration
