MARCH TO 250

THIS TIME, THEY'RE REPLAYING FOR KEEPS

LINCOLN

It's a raw, gray, cold morning in the tall woods of Lincoln, and the British are coming. Dozens of them, clad in scarlet, carrying Brown Bess muskets, and running for cover wherever they can find it.

Flanking them on two sides are more armed Minute Men than they can make out amid the underbrush, stone walls, and natural camouflage a few miles east of North Bridge in Concord, where the embattled Redcoats had been repulsed by the rebels.

“We're the welcoming committee,” a member of the Concord Minute Men said, chuckling to a 21st-century civilian a few minutes before the Redcoats burst into view.

The soldiers on both sides are all Revolutionary War reenactors, and this recent full-dress rehearsal for the 250th anniversary of the bloody British retreat from Concord to Boston on April 19 is serious, down-and-dirty business. Although these war games are staged every year, this milestone commemoration carries extra meaning.

“These were the first casualties to die for what we represent today,” said Henry Liu of the Lexington Minute Men, who will participate in Boston City Councilor Tania Fernandes Anderson has agreed to plead guilty to two of the six federal corruption charges against her, and announced Tuesday that she will resign.

“I have decided to plead guilty and resolve the case brought against me. I would like to apologize to my constituents, supporters, and all who have been impacted,” Fernandes

The councilor could face prison time.

Anderson said in a statement released by her lawyer. “Please forgive me.”

She added, “I will be resigning. It is the right thing to do.”

Her statement was issued hours after court filings showed she will plead guilty to two counts for allegedly arranging to receive a kickback from a City Council staff member: one count of wire fraud and one of theft from a program receiving federal funds. Four other wire fraud counts will be dropped by prosecutors as part of the deal.

Prosecutors will recommend that she be sentenced to one year and a day in prison, followed by 36 months of supervised release, and be ordered to pay $13,000 in restitution.

Countries ready to deal, says Trump

Indicates next round of tariffs will still take effect, with another 50% on China

By Ana Swanson and Alan Rappeport
NEW YORK TIMES

WASHINGTON — The Trump administration signaled Tuesday that it is ready to negotiate deals with countries targeted by sweeping tariffs, saying that 70 governments had approached the United States to try to roll the levies back and that officials would begin talks with Japan, South Korea, and other nations.

But President Trump and his advisers have been clear that those entreaties will not stop the next round of tariffs from going into effect just after midnight Wednesday, including another 50 percent duty on China. As a result, tariffs on Chinese goods will be at least 104 percent.

On Tuesday, Trump acknowledged his tariffs had been “somewhat explosive,” but he defended the policy and said “the money is pouring in at a level we've never seen before.”

“We have a lot of countries coming in to make deals,” he said Tuesday afternoon at a White House event.

Earlier in the day, Trump said on social media that he had “a great call” with South Korea's acting president, Han Duck-soo, about trade and tariffs, and that South Korean officials were heading to the United States for talks. He also expressed optimism that a trade war with China could be averted.

“China also wants to make a deal, badly, but they don't know how to get it started,” Trump wrote. “We are waiting for their call. It will happen!”

At Harvard lab, fear that crucial fight against TB will be sidelined Tuberculosis infects more than a quarter of the world's population, kills more than 1 million people per year, and is still a scourge at home. It has never disappeared from the United States, and there was even a recent cluster of cases in Boston, according to Sarah Fortune, a Harvard scientist leading one of the world's preeminent tuberculosis research programs.

►High-profile voices are calling on Harvard to stand its ground against Trump. B1.

Her lab, along with its collaborators at 11 other sites across the country and in Africa, has solved some of the crucial mysteries of the disease, and continues making discoveries that could prove life-saving for generations to come.

That enterprise is now at risk, caught up in the Trump administration's antisemitism investigation at Harvard. Fortune's $60 million contract with the National Institutes of Health was the number one project threatened in a memo the Trump administration sent to Harvard last week, apparently because it was the largest.

If that contract is canceled, “it's over,” Fortune said Monday at her Boston laboratory.

The funding for Fortune's program is just one of hundreds of grants and contracts now under “review” as the Trump administration investigates Harvard's response to campus antisemitism

Barriers still keep officers from getting help

Stigma of mental illness, fear of career consequences have many suffering in silence

Massachusetts State Trooper Chris O'Neil did not speak about what he saw at work, his wife, Molly, said. He kept those burdens to himself.

But in February 2016, they started to show, she said. He was anxious that he'd be hurt or killed on duty. Later that month, the 44-year-old trooper skipped his annual physical, afraid he'd lose his job if the agency learned he was struggling psychologically, Molly O'Neil said. That same day, he took his life.

“He was talking about, if I go into this appointment today and they catch that I'm anxious, they'll take me off the road,” she said, sitting in the living room of the Franklin home they used to share. “He really thought they could come take his uniform.”

O'Neil's death represents a crisis that continues to trouble the law enforcement profession, according to a recent survey by the state's Peace Officer Standards and Training Commission: Despite years of state and local efforts to bolster psychological support for police, many officers remain reluctant to use those services. It's a potentially lethal problem in a profession where exposure to traumatic violence is common and a
