

Markets stage a dramatic rebound

Global markets staged a powerful rebound yesterday, marking their fastest recovery since 2022. The sharp turnaround comes after a three-day selloff, driven by renewed optimism over potential trade agreements.

In the US, major stock indexes surged, with one key benchmark rising 3.5 per cent. The gains helped pull markets away from the brink of a bear market, as investors rushed to buy after steep losses.

Asian and European markets followed the US rally. Japan led gains in the region after US Treasury Secretary Scott Bessent said Tokyo would be prioritised in trade talks with Washington, fueling investor confidence.

While tensions remain high — Beijing criticised the US tariff stance as “black-mail” — markets found relief in signs that negotiations are possible. President Trump also hinted at progress in trade discussions with South Korea.

Moment of calm

Strategists at JPMorgan and other firms believe the bounce reflects a market setup for a tactical rebound, even if trade resolutions take time. Others, like Bespoke Investment Group, note that ongoing talks are helping ease selling pressure.

After days of volatility and fears of a financial crisis repeat, the rebound offers a moment of calm for investors, though caution remains the prevailing mood in the near term.
