

Trump hints other nations may be targets

Appoints aides to oversee Venezuela; criticism intensifies across globe

GLOBE NEWS SERVICES

The Trump administration ratcheted up its rhetoric for a more expansive and lengthy intervention in Venezuela and in other nations as well, while leaders from South America to Europe on Tuesday condemned the US words and actions in increasingly strident terms.

Three days after a US forces captured Venezuela president Nicolás Maduro and his wife in a daring raid, the Trump administration suggested the United States would be involved there for the foreseeable future, with the president telling NBC News the country was not ready to hold elections. He also named some of his top aides to oversee the next steps.

Moreover, the newly emboldened administration warned that Venezuela might not be its only target as it renewed calls for an American takeover of the Danish territory of Greenland for the sake of US security interests

Stephen Miller, a top aide to Trump, asserted that Greenland rightfully belonged to the United States and that the Trump administration could seize the semiautonomous Danish territory if it wanted.

“Nobody’s going to fight the United States militarily over the future of Greenland,” Miller told Jake Tapper, the CNN host, after being asked repeatedly whether he would rule out using military force.

The remarks were part of a vocal push by Miller, long a powerful behind-the-scenes player in Trump administration policy, to justify a vision for a new world order in which the United States could freely overthrow national governments and take foreign territory and resources so long as it was in the national interest.

Senator Bernie Sanders, a Vermont independent, denounced Miller’s remarks soon afterward, saying that “Mr. Miller gave a very good definition of imperialism.”

Denmark’s prime minister, Mette Frederiksen, warned that a US attack on Greenland

VENEZUELA, Page A4

Staying current on all things Nantucket

Online news site keeps pulse of islanders

By Aidan Ryan
GLOBE STAFF

Winter is typically quiet time on the Cape and Islands. But not for the Nantucket Current.

Just in the past month, the island’s digital news outlet had a scoop on an emerging challenge to short-term rentals, covered a breaking story about the Trump administration’s pause of offshore wind farms, and reported on a brawl at Nantucket’s annual Christmas Stroll that TMZ, the New York Post, and the Daily Mail all picked up.

Since it launched four years ago to challenge the island’s 204-year-old newspaper, the Current has become for many the definitive source for Nantucket news both on and off the island. Like most newsrooms, it pledges to reach audiences where they are, and has delivered on that mission with a 20,000-subscriber newsletter that goes deep on local issues such as housing. It has about 167,000 followers on its Instagram, where it posts

NANTUCKET, Page A10

FIVE YEARS LATER

CHIP SOMODEVILLA/GETTY IMAGES

Police separated protesters as they clashed with participants in a march marking the anniversary of the attack on the US Capitol. A2.

Brown suspect confesses in videos

No motive offered on device found following suicide

By Shelley Murphy and Lea Skene
GLOBE STAFF

In a series of short videos recovered by law enforcement after his death by suicide, the suspect in the Brown University mass shooting and the killing of an MIT professor confessed to the attacks and expressed no remorse, yet offered little explanation for his violence.

tion for his violence.

The Justice Department released transcripts of the videos Tuesday, revealing the final thoughts of Claudio Manuel Neves Valente, who was found dead in a New Hampshire storage facility in December. Officials did not release the actual videos, but the transcripts present a chilling diatribe laced with deep-seated anger and bitterness that unfolds in a rambling, stream-of-conscious fashion.

However, it provides only limited insight into what propelled Neves Valente to plan and execute his murderous rampage.

“I am not going to apologize, because during my lifetime no one sincerely apologized to me,” he said, according to the transcripts, which were released by US Attorney Leah B. Foley, along with a statement about the ongoing investigation. The videos were largely in Portuguese and translated into English by authorities.

In them, Neves Valente did not explicitly state a motive for either shooting.

He denied being mentally ill, repeatedly saying: “I am sane.” But he said he was sure people would say otherwise.

Above all, Neves Valente was upset he had injured his eye from a shell casing during one of his shootings and had trouble seeing.

“Honestly, my only regret is this thing in the eye [laughs],” he said, according to the transcripts.

He also said the attacks didn’t go completely as he had planned, saying “it was all a little incompetent but at least something was done.” He said he didn’t regret what he did, though he wasn’t “extraordinarily satisfied” either.

BROWN, Page A7

‘DOGE fever’ lingers in states

Officials adopt policies, politics of cut, cut, cut

By Sam Brodey
GLOBE STAFF

WASHINGTON — When President Trump and the billionaire Elon Musk launched their “Department of Government Efficiency” project to reshape Washington in early 2025, they inspired Republicans around the country to start copycat efforts in their own state capitals.

From New Hampshire to Florida to Texas, governors and lawmakers hoped to harness the buzzy DOGE brand to advance their own government-overhauling goals — or just to advance their own political ambitions.

The country had “DOGE fever,” Florida Congressman Aaron Bean declared to the Globe in January.

Nearly a year later, DOGE fever has long since broken in Washington, and it may take years to unravel the full impact of its chaotic spending cuts and forced shutdowns of whole agencies.

But DOGE’s dozen of copycat aspirants in state capitals kept working long after Musk’s chain-saw fell silent.

Some of them attracted con-

DOGE, Page A6

For six years, local authorities had failed to carry out safety inspections of the bar that became engulfed in an inferno in the Swiss Alps, killing 40. A3.

Maxim Naumov wasn’t sure he’d skate again after losing his parents and coaches in last year’s plane crash in Washington, D.C. Now he’s aiming to make the Olympic team. C1.

The Trump administration plans to freeze $10 billion in funding for low-income families in five states controlled by Democrats, claiming widespread fraud. A2.

Gloves, rain o’er me

Wednesday: Early rain. High 36-41, low 31-36.

Thursday: The sun returns. High 42-47, low 31-36.

Weather and comics, G6-7.

VOL. 309, NO. 7

*

Suggested retail price $4.00

