

The Boston Globe

Serving our community since 1872

FRIDAY, MAY 1, 2026

Ruling on maps may be felt here

Districts drawn with diversity in mind could be challenged

By Anjali Huynh
GLOBE STAFF

The Supreme Court's gutting this week of the landmark Voting Rights Act has sparked fears that officials could transform congressional maps in the South and challenge battleground districts designed to empower voters and candidates of color.

But voting rights advocates, elected officials, and legal experts say the ruling could change future map-making even in deep-blue Massachusetts, where lawmakers have explicitly considered racial diversity in creating their districts.

Many say the court's ruling, known as Louisiana v. Callais, could spark challenges to districts drawn to account for the state's increasing diversity, as well as limit racial diversity from being a factor in future districting efforts, the next of which looms in five years.

Those changes, critics fear, could mute communities of color and erode diversity in the elected offices that represent them.

"As a Black woman in this country, I'm outraged for both myself, my communities, and the communities the Voter Table serves," said Shanique Rodriguez, executive director of the Massachusetts Voter Table, a coalition of more than 40 advocacy groups. "This is a deliberate attack on our vote and our voice at the ballot box."

The Voting Rights Act, perhaps the most significant voting law in the country's history, has for decades shaped representation at all levels by enforcing the prohibition of discrimination against racial minorities in voting.

VOTING RIGHTS, Page A6

The Celtics lost again to the 76ers, 106-93, and will have to play a Game 7 in a series they seemed to have in hand. C1.

The House passed legislation reopening the Department of Homeland Security, ending a record 76-day shutdown. A2.

Rodney Marshall, who is about to be sworn in as Boston's new fire commissioner, does not live in the city as required under municipal rules. B1.

The board of directors at Market Basket chose veteran manager Chuck Casassa to be president, the job long held by Arthur T. Demoulas. B5.

The stars are back for "The Devil Wears Prada 2," 20 years after the original. Critic Odie Henderson's take, G1.

Got it May'd

Friday: Nice, warmer. High 62-67. Low 44-49.
Saturday: Mostly decent. High 56-61. Low 45-50.
Sunrise: 5:39 Sunset: 7:44
Weather and Comics, G6-7.

VOL. 309, NO. 121

*

Suggested retail price
$4.00

Mills pulls out of Senate race in Maine

Choice of Democratic leaders is outpaced by progressive Platner in bid to take on Collins

By Sam Brodey and James Pindell
GLOBE STAFF

WASHINGTON — Maine Governor Janet Mills suspended her campaign for Senate on Thursday, a stunning defeat for the seasoned politician and an embarrassing rebuke to Democratic Party leadership that strongly backed her campaign over progressive upstart Graham Platner.

Mills said in a statement that her campaign had run out of money.

"While I have the drive and passion, commitment and experience, and above all else — the fight — to continue on, I very simply do not have the one thing that political campaigns unfortunately require today: the financial resources," she said.

The governor did not endorse Platner, or even mention him.

Mills's announcement was abrupt but not a surprise. Her campaign had been on the ropes for weeks. The two-term governor was outworked and outmaneuvered by a millennial war veteran and oyster farmer who was largely unknown in the state less than a year ago.

With consistently poor polling numbers and middling enthusiasm from voters — and, frankly, from the candidate herself — Mills may have surmised that she lacked a viable path to the nomination without significantly more financial support.

At the end of March, Mills's campaign reported having just over $1 million in the bank, compared with $2.7 million for Platner. The governor's allies in Governor Janet Mills said her campaign has run out of money.

Washington also declined to bankroll ads on her behalf — though speaking to the Globe in April, Mills dismissed the idea she needed their help.

Now, Platner is all but assured to win the primary on June 9, setting up a general election clash against Republican Senator Susan Collins. It will be a study of stark contrasts that will have far-reaching implications for the balance of power in Washington.

In a statement, Platner praised Mills, MILLS, Page A7

REVISIONIST HISTORY

FINN GOMEZ FOR THE BOSTON GLOBE

Faneuil Hall Marketplace landlord J. Safra Real Estate is doing some long-awaited renovations, including fixing the stones in the marketplace's courtyard. Above, a view of Quincy Market from Chatham Street.

Months later, still no autopsy results on man who died after fight in jail

By Danny McDonald
GLOBE STAFF

Nearly five months after an incarcerated man died following a fight with correctional officers at the Suffolk County House of Correction in Boston, state medical authorities have yet to issue a cause of death, frustrating loved ones and advocates alike.

Shacoby Kenny, a 32-year-old Springfield native with a history of mental health problems, died on Dec. 8 following a few moments of chaotic violence, at least some of which were captured on video surveillance at the facility, commonly called South Bay.

The state's office of the chief medical examiner has yet to issue the cause and manner of Kenny's death, and no criminal charges have been filed against any of the correctional officers. The Suffolk district attorney's office said Wednesday that the matter is still under investigation.

Kenny's mother, Druesilla Brown, said she is frustrated with the wait for a cause of death.

"You don't get a lot of answers as to what's happening with the autopsy," she said.

Brown, 60, of Springfield, is convinced the fight with the correctional officers is what caused his death.

"The major thing is that he wanted to live, he wanted to have a life," she said. "I think of what could have been. That's where my mind is right now. His future was taken from him."

Katy Naples-Mitchell, an attorney and criminal justice scholar at Harvard Kennedy School, called the delay "concerning and confusing" because the

AUTOPSY, Page A7

In the end, Cora, Breslow were at odds

Friction over training methods and coaches dated to last season

By Alex Speier
GLOBE STAFF

Nearly one week later, aftershocks continue to ripple through the Red Sox organization. The decision to fire Alex Cora and six members of the coaching staff represented a seismic and unfamiliar in-season shakeup.

Throughout the tenure of the current ownership group, the idea of in-season managerial change had been avoided. The team rode out a full, chaotic year of Bobby Valentine in 2012 before dismissing him the day after the season. In 2017, when John Farrell and president of baseball operations Dave Dombrowski had a clubhouse blow-up on May 1 that marked the beginning of the end of the manager's tenure, the team stuck with Farrell all year out of concern for the unknowable impact a major in-season leadership change would have on a young group.

Last weekend, the Sox reached a different conclusion after a 9-17 start, firing Cora, bench coach Ramón Vázquez, game plan-

RED SOX, Page C4

BARRY CHIN/GLOBE STAFF

In the past, Alex Cora had made it clear he would not tolerate his coaches being fired.

JONATHAN WIGGS/GLOBE STAFF

"Audit" was the word at the Massachusetts Republican Party's convention last weekend.

When it comes to audit, GOP on Democrat's side

DiZoglio gets plenty of support as she presses the Legislature

By Samantha J. Gross
GLOBE STAFF

WORCESTER — The five-letter word on everyone's lips at the Massachusetts Republican Party's convention on Saturday had nothing to do with the current president and everything to do with a sitting Democrat on Beacon Hill.

"Where the hell is our audit?" Republican US Senate candidate John Deaton bellowed from the convention stage.

His question was met with roaring applause.

Party activists who gathered at the DCU Center showed up to back different candidates for governor and lieutenant governor, while also taking plenty of time to clamor for personal concerns running the gamut from gun rights to transgender children in sports. But the delegates were perhaps no more united on any other topic than one: the legislative audit, being pushed by state Auditor Diana DiZoglio, a Methuen Democrat.

AUDIT, Page A6