‘HONEST AND DECENT’

In the decades since they dismissed Jimmy Carter as a weak president, historians came to consider him one of America’s greatest former leaders.

By Scott Kraft

Jimmy Carter, a peanut farmer and little-known Georgia governor who became the 39th president of the United States, promising “honest and decent” government to Watergate-weary Americans, and later returned to the world stage as an influential human rights advocate and Nobel Peace Prize winner, has died. He was 100.

When his turbulent presidency ended after a stinging reelection loss in 1980, Carter retreated to Plains, Ga., his political career over. Over the four decades that followed, though, he forged a legacy of public service, building homes for the needy, monitoring elections around the globe and emerging as a fearless and sometimes controversial critic of governments that mistreated their citizens.

He lived longer than any U.S. president in history and was still regularly teaching Bible classes at his hometown Maranatha Baptist Church well into his 90s. During his post-presidency, he also wrote more than 30 books, including fiction, poetry, deeply personal reflections on his faith, and commentaries on Middle East strife.

Though slowed by battles with melanoma that spread to his brain and liver, and a series of falls and hip replacement in recent years, he returned again and again to his charity work and continued to offer occasional political commentary, including in support of mail-in voting ahead of the 2020 presidential election.

Carter was in his first term as Georgia governor when he launched his campaign to unseat President Ford in the 1976 election. At the time, the nation was still shaken by President Nixon’s resignation in the Watergate scandal and by the messy end of the Vietnam War. As a moderate Southern Democrat, a standard-bearer of what was then regarded as a more racially tolerant “new South,” Carter promised a government “as good and honest and decent and competent and compassionate and as filled with love as are the American people.”

Leftists seek to inform, not inflame

‘Know Your Enemy’ focuses on understanding the American right

By JEFFREY FLEISHMAN

If Democrats want to understand why President-elect Donald Trump is returning to the White House, a good place to start might be the “Know Your Enemy” podcast, hosted by two self-described leftist bros who, without mockery or tongue-in-cheek elitism, explore the complicated past and feverish present of the American conservative movement.

It’s a sort of anti-Joe Rogan program for a perplexed and dismayed left-wing set be the “Know Your Enemy” podcast, hosted by two self-described leftist bros who, without mockery or tongue-fans of the Grateful Dead and why so many right-wing commentators suffer from “Taylor Swift derangement syndrome.” The show’s interrogation of conservative history is rigorous and occasionally peppered with expletives, but the exchanges with guests are nuanced and civil.

“Know Your Enemy” was started in 2019 by Matthew Sitman, the son of a factory worker raised in a Christian fundamentalist home in central Pennsylvania, and Sam Adler-Bell, a Jew who grew up in a left-leaning family, listening to union leaders and visiting picket lines with his labor-lawyer father. They met when Sitman, then an

Newsom plan against deportations forms

An internal draft memo obtained by The Times shows the governor’s concept.

By ANDREA CASTILLO

WASHINGTON — Gov. Gavin Newsom’s administration has drafted a conceptual plan to help immigrants without proper documentation who are under threat of deportation after President-elect Donald Trump takes office.

But some advocates worry the proposal doesn’t do enough to protect those who are detained amid immigration proceedings.

“Trump’s promise to use militarized raids against our state will have devastating consequences for our communities and our economy,” said Hamid Yazdan-Panah, advocacy director for Immigrant Defense Advocates. “California needs a strategy on detention that ensures access to counsel and prevents family separation.”

Yazdan-Panah said his and other advocacy organizations prefer a plan put forth by the state Senate, which includes funding for lawyers to represent detained immigrants as they go through immigration proceedings. Detention is anticipated to increase as Trump carries out mass deportation plans, and federal officials are eyeing a new facility in California.

The governor’s office didn’t immediately respond to a request for comment.

A fact sheet obtained by The Times, titled “Immigrant Support Network Concept,” offers few details about Newsom’s proposal, which is under review. Under [See Newsom, A5]
