

Market reactions to Trump’s tariff announcements

Markets soar with tariffs put on pause

President reverses course on plan — with exception of China — leading Wall Street to exhale with huge rally.

By MICHAEL WILNER

WASHINGTON — President Trump walked back plans on Wednesday for a global trade war that sparked fears of economic panic and recession, a dramatic reversal after a week of market turmoil that led to a historic surge of relief on Wall Street.

But the president further escalated his standoff with China over tariffs, raising duties on America’s third-largest trading partner to 125%. Trump’s tariff on foreign automobiles, set at 25%, remains in place.

Markets responded to Trump’s reversal with an exuberant surge, a turn of fortunes after news of the president’s policies last week wiped out $7 trillion in value over just three days of trading. Overnight, a U.S. bond market sell-off added to concerns over a spiraling economic crisis.

Minutes after Trump changed course, the Dow Jones industrial average rose over 2,900 points. The Nasdaq was up 12% at the closing bell. And the Standard & Poor’s 500 increased over 9.5% — its largest gain since the 2008 financial crisis— but was still down more than 11% from its February high.

The turnabout provided temporary relief from a policy that experts warned could upend the global economy, sending prices in the United States up across the board and risking global recession.

Trump administration officials initially explained the policy switch as part of an organized plan: “This was his strategy all along,” Treasury Secretary Scott Bessent said.

Yet, within the hour, Trump himself acknowledged that dire market blowback from his announcement last week forced him to back down.

The initial policy plan had countries paying a universal tariff of 10% to import their goods to the United States. Other, select countries, which the president believed were treating the

[See Tariffs, A6]

Consumers caught in a quandary

Facing tariff uncertainty, some are buying less and looking for ways to pinch pennies. Others are stocking up in anticipation of price hikes.

By KAREN GARCIA AND SALVADOR HERNANDEZ

Sweeping tariffs have yet to hit the shelves of his local Costco, but Trinidad Estrada is bracing for the impact on his family finances.

The retired construction worker from Los Angeles said prices were already high, but the financial turmoil and fear of inflation fueled by President Trump’s on again, off again tariff proclamations have added pressure to economize.

He and his wife live on a fixed income, and the couple are shying away from beef, pork and chicken.

One bright spot, he said, was that the price of eggs had gone down.

“Look, all I’m buying is eggs,” he said as he loaded four cartons into his trunk. “Our check, not sure it can make it.”

With stock prices swinging and economists predicting price hikes across a broad range of imported goods, there are plenty of anxious questions ricocheting in supermarket aisles these days.

Some are buying less and looking for ways to pinch pennies. Others are stocking up on some items in anticipation

[See Consumers, A6]

ROBERT GAUTHIER Los Angeles Times

AT A MARKET in Walnut, Juan Balmaceda stocks shelves with celery grown in California. Many grocery items come from foreign countries.

Broadcast television stations send a signal to Washington: SOS

By STEPHEN BATTAGLIO

As television station owners gathered in Las Vegas this week for the annual National Assn. of Broadcasters convention, they sent an urgent message to Washington that could be summed up in one word: “Help.”

Streaming video has siphoned away the traditional viewing audience. Advertisers have shifted their budgets to digital and away from broadcasters. On the horizon, there is fear that streaming will get more of broadcast TV’s last surefire attraction, the NFL, which can exit its media rights deal after the 2029 season.

All of this raises the question for the broadcast TV business that has offered news, entertainment and sports to viewers for generations: What will the business look like five years from now, and what can be done to preserve it?

Station owners such as Nexstar Media Group, E.W. Scripps and Fox Television Stations say part of the answer has to be consolidation, which would allow them to better withstand the competition from huge tech firms. But long-standing regulations stand in the way.

Now, the companies are calling on the Federal Communications Commission, chaired by President Trump appointee Brendan Carr, to lift ownership caps that currently limit them to owning two TV outlets in a single market. The total number of stations owned by one company can cover no more than 39% of the U.S., which was last revised upward in the pre-streaming era of 2004.

“We’re not looking for a handout here from Washington,” NAB President and Chief Executive Curtis LeGeyt said in a recent interview. “We are just looking for the ability to compete on a level playing field.”

The NAB filed a petition with the FCC to change the rules last week, saying, “The time to end this harmful restriction is now.”

Tech companies such as Google and Facebook have no such constraints operating locally or nationally. YouTube now accounts for 11% of all TV viewing. Free ad-supported streaming services such as Tubi are

[See TV, A9]

A’s move into minor league home

West Sacramento has no complaints as rebound city

By JESSICA GARRISON

WEST SACRAMENTO — The arrival of a major league team to this decidedly minor league city last week was not, as they say in baseball, error-free.

Players for the A’s, formerly of Oakland and eventually to be of Las Vegas, were unfamiliar with the layout of their temporary home, Sutter Health Park. There was “a lot of chaos,” manager Mark Kotsay told the Sacramento Bee, as the team tried to figure out how to navigate the much smaller footprint of a triple-A ballpark.

The Wi-Fi went down. The radio broadcast cut out numerous times. The beer

[See A’s, A12]

GODOFREDO A. VÁSQUEZ Associated Press

FANS arrive at Sutter Health Park, the temporary home of the A’s, to see their team play the Cubs.

Swanky Cheviot Hills’ gift of high-tech cameras to LAPD gets pushback

By LIBOR JANY

When residents of a ritzy Westside neighborhood experienced an increase in burglaries last year, they decided to invest in technology to fight the problem.

The neighborhood association in Cheviot Hills — a community of million-dollar homes sandwiched between the 10 Freeway and Century City — raised more than $200,000 to purchase scores of controversial, high-tech cameras that scan license plates.

The automated plate readers, as they are known, enable authorities to track when vehicles of interest pass through certain intersections. The devices can also be mounted on police cars, allowing officers to sweep up troves of license plate data as they drive around. Police say the gadgets help investigate stolen cars, locate fugitives, and solve crimes by checking who came and went from a neighborhood on any given day.

But when the community donated the cameras to the Los Angeles Police Foundation — one of several nonprofits that support the Los Angeles Police Department — they sent them with strings attached: The police were only allowed to use

[See Cameras, A9]

Misuse alleged of food bank’s funds

State accuses leaders of diverting over $11 million into their own pockets. CALIFORNIA, B1

Female majority for 2028 Games

IOC approves a record number of medal events and expands contests within L.A. SPORTS, B10

Softer industrial property market

Demand for Southland warehouses is expected to fall if tariffs take effect. BUSINESS, A8

Weather

Partly sunny. L.A. Basin: 81/59. B6

For the latest news, go to latimes.com.

Printed with soy inks on partially recycled paper.

Every story. Every section. Every feature.

Subscribers get unlimited app access. Download now.

