Trump backs off stiff tariffs, for now

Price of running shoes may soon knock your socks off

That $150 pair of your favorite running shoes could soon double in cost — if it's made in China.

Few people are more familiar with this sobering math than Tony Post, chief executive of Topo, a Framingham-based shoe company. As a long-distance runner, Post knows a thing or two about overcoming adversity. But the way President Trump keeps layering on additional tariffs for goods made in China, with another big hit arriving on Wednesday, is enough to try even Post's endurance.

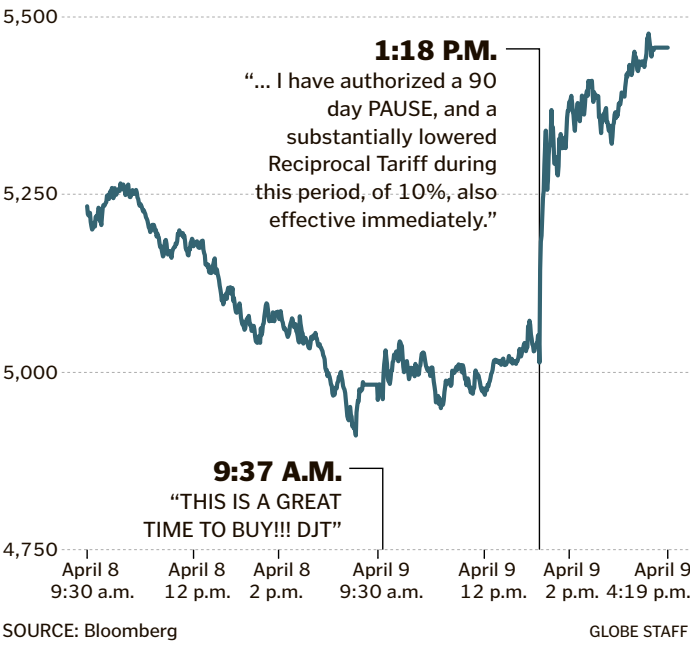

Post's company relies heavily on Chinese manufacturing, procuring nearly 90 percent of its shoes from factories in China. He already had enough a week ago when his running total for tariffs on Chinese imports hit 71 percent on the manufacturing cost of the shoes.

Then on Monday, Trump said he was ready to slap another 50 percent tariff on imports from China, followed by yet another threat Wednesday of an additional 21 percent.

The S&P 500 soared on Trump's rollback of most new tariffs

Facing worldwide upheaval, he calls for 90-day pause, but not with China

WASHINGTON — President Trump on Wednesday dramatically reversed course on steep global tariffs that have roiled markets, upset members of his own party, and raised fears of a recession, saying just hours after stiff levies went into effect on nearly 60 countries that he would pause them for 90 days.

But the president did not back down on China and instead raised tariffs once again on all of its exports to the United States, bringing those import taxes to a whopping 125 percent. That decision came after Beijing had raised its levies on American goods to 84 percent in an escalating tit-for-tat between the world's largest economies that showed no signs of cooling.

In a post on Truth Social, the president said that he had authorized “a 90 day PAUSE” in which countries would face “a substantially lowered Reciprocal Tariff” of 10 percent. As a result, almost every trading partner now faces a 10 percent blanket tariff, except for China, which faces a 125 percent tax.

The S&P 500 climbed about 7 percent in a matter of minutes after Trump's post, sharply reversing days of losses. Wednesday was the best day for the S&P

College leaders showing signs of resistance to demands

Some heed call to speak up for academic freedom

While the Harvard community anxiously awaits the school's response to demands from the Trump administration, the heads of several other elite universities are emerging as leaders of a burgeoning resistance to the president's attacks on higher education.

For now, most of that resistance has come in the form of public comments rather than in a direct confrontation with the administration, such as refusing to implement changes or face the loss of federal funding.

The schools include Princeton, Brown, Wesleyan, and Mount Holyoke College, where president Danielle Holley said in an interview that higher education faces an “existential crisis” that requires college leaders to speak out because “the very values that higher education is built upon are under attack.”

As a small liberal arts school, Mount Holyoke doesn't have as much federal funding on the line as major research universities. Nonetheless, Holley has previously said the women's school in South Hadley would rather forgo federal contracts

A fatal chase, an elusive truth

Answers still sought about officers who continued to pursue teens despite order

The driver hit the gas pedal and sped away from the Boston police officers during the early morning traffic stop. The officers jumped into their unmarked cruiser, activated the lights and siren, and gave chase. A supervisor quickly told them to stand down — don't risk a high-speed pursuit over a traffic violation, he warned, deferring to department policy.

“Terminate, please,” the ranking officer said over the radio, shortly after 3 a.m. on Jan. 4, 2024.

Officer Triston Champagnie, sitting in the passenger seat, verbally acknowledged the command, and Officer Matthew Farley, the driver, turned the lights and siren off. But they kept following the Hyundai anyway, both officers later acknowledged to investigators, as it wove along Gallivan Boulevard and onto Morrissey Boulevard in Dorchester. Once they were on Morrissey, Farley turned the lights back on, both officers said, because they wanted to warn other drivers away.

What happened next was by all accounts a tragedy, but one that continues to raise questions about the chase and the responsibility of the police officers involved. Three of the four occupants of the car, all teenagers, died after accelerating to speeds that reached 106 miles per hour and then crashing as police continued to follow them on Morrissey.

Cuts may endanger residential care programs for kids

For much of the past two years, 9-year-old Tay Molnar's extreme impulsivity, mood swings, and flares of temper that could escalate into self-harm or violence against family members forced the child into a constant rotation between home and hospitalizations.

Inpatient stays, some separated by less than a week, never seemed to help. What started to make a difference, finally, was a referral to Three Rivers Clinically Intensive Residential Treatment, a Belchertown home for children with serious behavioral health challenges. About six weeks in, Tay, who is nonbinary, has shown signs of stabilizing.

“We would much rather they be home with us and they'd much rather be at home,” said Erin

Molnar, Tay's mother, “but this is really the best scenario to keep them safe.”

The home, the only one in the state that provides months of intense, residential behavioral health care for children 6 to 12, is unique, and endangered.
