Trump pushing Israel on Gaza aid

No specifics, but US to help ‘make sure they get food’

By Michelle L. Price

WASHINGTON — President Donald Trump expressed concern Monday over the worsening humanitarian situation in Gaza and urged Israel to get food to people, seemingly recalibrating his stance on Gaza as images of emaciated children have sparked renewed worries about hunger in the war-torn territory.

Trump, speaking in Scotland, said the U.S. and other nations are giving money and food to Gaza but that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has “got to sort of like run it.”

“I want him to make sure they get the food,” he said. “I want to make sure they get the food.”

Trump’s comments seemed to result from the images in recent days of the worsening hunger crisis in Gaza and were more urgent than the resigned message he had about the 21-month Israel-Hamas war last week, when ceasefire talks derailed. His remarks also marked a new divergence from Netanyahu after the two leaders had become closer since their nations’ joint strikes in Iran.

The president was asked if he agreed with Netanyahu’s comments Sunday that “there is no policy of starvation in Gaza and there is no starvation in Gaza.”

“I don’t know,” Trump replied. “I mean, based on television, I would say not particularly because those children look very hungry.”

In the face of mounting international criticism, the Israeli military began airdrops of aid over the weekend, along with limited pauses in fighting in three populated areas of Gaza for 10 hours a day to help with the distribution.

Trump had expressed some resignation Friday about the situation in Gaza after the U.S. and Israel pulled their negotiating teams out of talks in Qatar to try to reach a ceasefire. Trump said last week that Hamas was likely “going to be hunted down” and Israel is “going to have to fight and they’re going to have to clean it up.”

But Trump seemed more inclined to action Monday after

Parking space minimums eliminated

Change aimed at adding housing density near transit

By Jake Sheridan
Chicago Tribune

In what proponents say is a pivotal change to how housing gets built in much of Chicago, developers will now have an easy option to dedicate less space to cars after the City Council eliminated parking minimums near public transit.

Builders putting residences within a half mile of a Chicago Transit Authority train or within a quarter mile of a bus line will soon no longer need special approval to completely forgo parking spaces. Following the mid-July vote, the new standard appears to cover roughly three-quarters of the city.

The switch passed quickly, without pushback, when it came up in the Zoning Committee and again a day later in the full council. But mayoral critics, progressive aldermen, transit activists and developers alike said the quiet assent belies the policy’s impact.

“It makes it easier to build. It makes it more affordable to build,” lead sponsor Ald. Daniel La Spata, 1st, told the Tribune after the vote. “It gives much more flexibility to developers to add parking in ways that are meeting the market.”

By cutting mandates for expensive-to-build parking, the change will help more development “pencil out” and move ahead, said Sam Goldman, principal at real estate development and management firm Arbor Investment Management LLC.

“I think it’s an opportunity to start opening some of the doors to new construction,” Goldman said. “It makes more projects viable, especially in the neighborhoods.”

Developers in some areas were already able to eschew required parking with an administrative adjustment. La Spata’s ordinance extended the offer to all transit-served parts of the city

Summer violence touches parking lot prayer site on South Side

Allen Hall hunched at a picnic table outside the University of Chicago Medical Center last week under the beating sun, his head in his hands.

A few days before, Hall’s 24-year-old daughter, Arneka McReynolds, had taken a special trip down to Chicago with her fiancé from their home in Michigan to attend the Simeon Career Academy alumni cookout. That night of July 19, Hall woke up to his son banging on his front door, and he learned his daughter was at the hospital after being shot in the head.

Many people who attended the event had decamped to the Dan Ryan Woods after the official cookout ended. Others headed to south suburban Calumet City. And hundreds, including McReynolds, made their way to a Chatham parking lot on West 87th Street overlooking the Dan Ryan just before midnight when the gunfire started.

The lot has become a place where a small but dedicated group has gathered weekly for years to pray for the many people who get caught up in Chicago’s summer violence spike.

‘I’m tired of forcing our children to duck and cover’

Gov. Pritzker signs two more gun control measures into law

By Olivia Olander and Jeremy Gornor
Chicago Tribune

With gun violence still a persistent problem despite recent drops in Chicago, Gov. JB Pritzker signed a pair of gun control efforts into law Monday — one that requires Illinoisans to more quickly report lost firearms and another mandating law enforcement agencies statewide participate in a federal gun tracing platform.

The two modest measures are the latest additions to the suite of gun control laws enacted under Pritzker’s watch, including a sweeping ban on high-powered firearms and ammunition magazines that remains under legal challenge.

“I’m tired, frankly, of treating something completely preventable as inevitable,” Pritzker, flanked by about a dozen members of the General Assembly and other elected officials, said at a downtown news conference. “I’m tired of forcing our children to duck and cover because too many politicians are ducking and covering for the gun industry’s money.”

One of the new laws is aimed at the safe storage of guns. It reduces the amount of time gun owners have to report lost or stolen firearms from 72 hours to 48 hours after they discover a gun is missing. It also eliminates some exceptions to requirements that guns be kept in a locked box in households where children and teenagers could get a hold of them.
